PREFACE.

THE Universal Dictionary, which is now offered in a complete form to the public, is a work which, when the labor and care involved in its preparation are considered, has been equalled by few works in the history of literature. Nearly seventeen years of labor were consumed by the experienced editor and his corps of able assistants in its preparation. Nor is this period in any sense extreme when we consider the character of the work, original alike in ts conception and its handling, and occupying as it does new ground in the republic of letters. The labor involved in the preparation of an ordinary dictionary-such a one, for instance, as Webster or Worcester-is exceedingly great, but this labor is increased to an extent which few persons appreciate in the case of a work like the present, which is not alone a dictionary, but adds to it the characteristics of an encyclopædia; giving not only the meanings of words, but their entire history, and a compact array of the most valuable information concerning them.

The Universal Dictionary, was originally intended to be limited to 4656 pages; but it became evident to the editor as the work progressed, that if it was to be completed in the exhaustive manner in which it had been commenced a considerable addition to this space would be necessary, and in the end nearly 700 pages were added, bringing the full work up to the grand total of 5359 pages-a library in a book. This addition was necessary to the completion of the work without unjust condensation of its concluding portions. Many who have occasion to refer to existing dictionaries must have noticed how the last few letters, say from $S$ to $Z$, have been compressed in order to bring the whole work within the limits originally laid out for it. Such a treatment causes a serious detriment to the value of any book so handled, and the publishers, in the present instance, decided that the fullest justice should be given to every word, however it might lengthen the total work. As a consequence, the public have now given them in the Universal Dictionary, the most exhaustive dictionary of the English language ever offered to the reading world. It was designed and has been carried out on a plan adopted by no other dictionary, the intention being to give the history of each word, step by step, showing the successive gradations of its meanings, as they rose out of each other, and illustrating each meaning by quotations from the written or printed page. In addition to this completeness of dictionary treatment, each word has been handled in the encyclopædic sense, and a vast amount of compact information in art, science, history and other branches of knowledge given, the whole rendering the work of inestimable value alike to reader and student. In this conception, involving as it did years of labor and research, the editor has eminently succeeded, and the publishers have no besitation in offering the result of his labor to the public as one without a rival in plan and unsurpassed in execution.

The Universal Dictionary, contains in round numbers some 180,000 words or headings ( 250,000 , including compound words). If this be compared with the number contained in other dictionaries, it will be seen at once how exhaustive it is. The early edition of Webster's Dictionary contained 70,000 words. Worcester's Dictionary and Supplement contains 116,000 words, Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, 118,000 words, and Webster's International Dictionary, 140,000 words. The Universal Dictionary, thus contains 40,000 more words than this most elaborate of its rivals.

But this is far from indicating the full measure of its comparative value, which cannot be estimated by the extra number of words alone. The completeness of treatment. of each word must also be taken into account. Each has here been subdivided as far as possible into the various meanings which it assumed at different times, so that its treatment. is not simply orthographical, but distinctively historical. The sorting and arranging of the slips containing quotations illustrative of the various senses in which words occur has been a task requiring very great care and labor, and one which has cost the editor and his assistants many hours of anxious thought.* The exhaustive character of the present work, therefore, cannot be fairly judged from its number of words as sompared with other dictionaries, since the space given to many words greatly exceeds that given by other lexicographers. A truer conception can be gained by comparing the total spaceoccupied. Thus Webster's International Dictionary contains (exclusive of Introduction, Appendix, etc.) 1681 pages, and Worcester's Dictionary 1696 pages, while the Universal Dictionary, with similar exclusions, extends to 5249 pages, or more than three times the number in either of the two leading dictionaries named.

It may be said further that the work has been brought up to date: words which have only recently come into use being duly inserted in their places, so that one may find within its pages a complete history of the English language from the time that this language fairly began to exist to the final decade of the Nineteenth Century.

The name of the editor, indeed, is a sufficient guarantee for the character of the work, Dr. Hunter's superior ability for a task of this kind being beyond question. His duties-which were a labor of love-were lightened by the valuable assistance of Mr . John Williams, M.A., of Trinity College, Oxford, and Mr. S. J. Herrtage, B.A., these two gentlemen having mainly prepared the dictionary portion of the work, while Dr. Hunter contributed the large majority of the encyclopædic articles. In adapting the work to the American public useful assistance has been rendered by Prof. Charles Morris, well known for his large experience in cncyclopædia work; by Prof. A. Estoclet, who, as a word-definer, occupies a high rank among American lexicographers; and by Prof. Seneca Egbert, M.D., of the Medico-Chirurgical College, Philadelphia. These general editorial labors were supplemented by material furnished by numerous specialists in various branches of science and art. The names of, and the classes of material furnished by, some few of these writers have been given on the title page; but it is impossible to mention by name a tithe of those who have contributed directly or indirectly to the work. Presidents, secretaries and members of scientific and learned societies, the chief officers of religious bodies, university professors, government officials, and a host of private persons have rendered willing aid by affording information in many cases possessed by themselves alone, the accuracy of the work being thus assured and its completion greatly hastened. The gratitude of the publishers and the thanks of the public are due to these voluntary co-laborers, who have done so much towards making the Universal Dictionary, what it is acknowledged to be, an invaluable work of reference for all classes of readers.

rance th ont THE FUNCIIONS OF A DICIIONARY.

The rapid growth and spread of living languages, the progress of philological and linguistic science, and the facilities afforded by the art of printing for the diffusion of knowledge, have made the dictionary an essential requisite to modern literature. The dictionary, as we now understand the term, is of comparatively recent origin. Manuscript vocabularies existed in ancient times, but the revival of classical learning at the close of the mediæval period created a necessity for the compilation of lexicons of the Greek and Latin tongues, and these were quickly followed by dictionaries of the modern languages, brief at first, but growing in amplitude as time went on and the demands of readers increased. This growth of the dictionary continues; modern languages are in a constant state of change and development; new words are continually being introduced in response to the demands of civilized progress, and older words are frequently dropping out of use: thus it is that the labors of the lexicographer are still, and probably will long continue to be, in demand. A dictionary may be described as an enlarged index verborum, a key to the works of the great masters who have adorned, and the speech of the people who have used, the language of whose elements it professes to be a repository. To serve, in any complete manner, the purposes for which it is designed, it must conform to certain requisites.

1. It should contain every word which properly belongs to the language and occurs in its printed literature, from the period when it became a distinct form of speech to the latest date.
2. It should give these words in the various forms of orthography which they have successively assumed, indicating those which are obsolete and those which are still in use.
3. It should represent by some simple and comprehensible system the pronunciation of every word, and the changes which have taken place in pronunciation, so far as known.
4. It should give as complete definitions as possible of the original and historically developed meanings, literal and topical, of each word, with copious exemplifications of their uses, in every sense ascribed to them, since the force and siguificance of words cannot be fully conveyed by definitions alone.
5. It should contain such combinatione of words, popularly called phrases or idioms, as have acquired a special signification not indicated by the ordinary meanings of the words composing them. If should treat as compounds all word combinations whose sense cannot be inferred from the meanings of their component elements, and shonld, where practicable, give in full the original formula of which they are often elliptical expressions.
6. The etymological history of each word, not formed by the regular modes of derivation and composition from other or naturalized words, should be traced from its earliest known or probable native root, or foreign analogue, to its latest form, and reference should be made to all related words which either explain any of its forms or meanings, or serve to show the ethnological relations of the language to other tongues.

Such is the ideal of a perfect dictionary. It is one that has rarely been attained or even closely approached. Up to the last few years lexicographers, or rather the compilers of dictionaries, have been content to copy from their predecessors, adding what fresh material they could readily obtain, but usually not taking the trouble to verify the words, definitions, or quotations found in existing works of the same kind. Misreadings and misspellings have thus been perpetuated, and in some cases words and meanings been given which had no existence beyond the brain of the comniler. Fortunately, in recent times, lexicographers have become far more careful and exacting, and the dictionaries of the present day are becoming, in a truer sense than ever before, faithful and trustworthy histories of the words of the various languages.

No other extant dictionary, however, can claim to fill the requisites above given in so full a sense as the Universal, Dictionary, in whose preparation all these essentials, have been sedulously attended to, with the purpose of making it, aside from its encyclopædic character, a complete and perfect dictionary of the English language.

SPECIAL CHARACTERISTICS OF THE UNIVERSAL DICTIONARY.

I. WHAT IT CONTAINS.

In many respects the Universal Dictionary, differs from its predecessors, and as well from its immediate rivals. In the first place, as the title implies, it is not an ordinary dictionary, in the sense of being confined to a mere alphabetical list of the words composing our language, but it partakes also of the character of an encyclopædia. In fact, it is at once a dictionary and an encyclopædia; it explains not only words but things; it gives not only the meanings of words, but also an explanation of the things to which such words are applied. For instance, under the words Gas, Steam Engine, Spectroscope, Architecture, etc., it does not confine itself to a bare account of the words, but gives a concise account of the things understood by these terms. Further, where such seemed likely to be of service to the student, an historical account of events connected with the word treated of has been given, supplemented by statistics brought up to the latest date. We may instance such words as Appendicitis, Roentgen Rays, Electrocution, Germ Theory, etc. With the exception of the terms of geography and biography, the Universal Dictionary, contains all the words to be found in an extended cyclopædia, while the dictionary proper includes not only modern English words, but a nearly exhaustive list of obsolete words from about Chaucer's time to the present, and, in addition, a complete vocabulary of words to be found in the works of Scott and Burns, the most widely read authors in Scottish literature.

1. t. nhicical terms.

In the compilation of a dictionary, one of the most important questions which arises is: What words can legitimately claim admission? This question is, of course, answered differently in different cases, in accordance with the scope of the plan and the degree of fulness with which it is proposed to treat the language. The present work being much more than an ordinary dictionary, or mere list of words with definitions, it necessarily contains very many words not usually included in dictionaries. Among these there can be no question that technical terms are entitled to insertion. The very title of the work expressly includes all such terms.

Not only science and art, but sports and every day occupations need to be attended to. While, for instance, racing, coursing, tennis, golf, and other games and sports, have terms of their own which are becoming more and more widely known, a definition of most of these terms would be vainly looked for in existing dictionaries, and could be found only in vocabularies specially devoted to such subjects. Even where admitted they are often incorrectly defined. In the present work an attempt has been made to include a complete collection of these technical terms, and to define them fully and accurately, thus giving the Universal Dictionary a special value to the large number of persons interested in the popular amusements, as well as those devoted to the arts and scienses. The same may be said in regard to legal terms, the technical words and phrases of the various law processes being clearly described, and all changes made of late years duly noted.
2. Slang and colloquialisms.

The propriety of inserting slang and colloquial terms and phrases may by some be questioned, yet certainly many of these may fairly claim a place. Few will question this so far as colloquialisms, as distinguished from slang proper, are concerned. It is difficult for many Euglish-speaking people, and impossible for foreigners, to guess at the meaning of numbers of our colloquial phrases from a reference to the literal meaning of the words composing them. This has induced the editor of the Universal Dictionary to give special attention to such phrases, and there will be found in this work, arranged under the heading of the main word, as complete a collection of colloquialisms as it was found possible to bring together. The right of slang terms and phrases to insertion is more open to question, but cogent reasons for giving them a place may be urged. In the first place, slang, or semi-slang, words and phrases enter largely into the language of commercial and social life, and it is often difficult to distinguish between what is slang and what is colloquial. Secondly, slang frequently expresses meanings and shades of meaning which it would be difficult, if not impossible, to convey exactly and clearly in more classical language. Thirdly, what is slang to-day, may to-morrow be recognized and used as good English by even our best writers.

On the other hand, many words now tabooed as slang, or even worse, were formerly used in good society; examples of which may be seen by reading "Pepys' Diary." Slang is also largely employed by the realistic novelists of the present day, so that it is mere prudery to affect ignorance of its existence, and it certainly should not be ignored in a dictionary of the present kind, to which it is hoped that every one will naturally turn who is at a loss to appreciate exactly the meaning of a word or phrase. It is not, of course, intended, nor would it be desirable, to insert every slang word. But in the modern growth of language slang terms are, in a measure, the roots of new words, and all that seem likely to attain this future dignity are fairly entitled to a present place. And many which will doubtless die out, or be replaced by others, are now so widely used or understood as to give them a similar claim.

3. special coinages.

Each case belonging to this class must be judged on its own merits, and no strict line or rule can be laid down. Many of these words are amusing and interesting, whine some are eminently expressive, and until the whole body of English literature has been carefully read it would be rash to assert positively that any such word is peculiar to the author in whose works the first instance (so far as known) of its use occurs. For instance. Madame D'Arblay, in her "Diary," uses the word agreeability, and claims it as her own coinage; yet Chaucer uses the same word. Disraeli, in his "Curiosities of Literature," claims to have coined the word fatherland. Yet it was used by Sir William Temple a century and more before him. Both these words are now given in ordinary dictionaries, and many such special coinages are as legitimate as other words, of no greater utility which have found a place in lexicons. There are others which may be looked upon as mere curiosities of literature,-such, for instance, as compactability and writability. Words of this kind can only be inserted as oddities, freaks of writers' fancies, and such of them as have been given is with this view alone, the purpose being to raise the Universal Dictionary, to a standard of completeness as a mirror of the English language and literature which none of its competitors even seek to attain.

4. SEMI-NATURALIZED WORDS.

There can hardly be any question as to the necessity of admitting this class of words into any dictionary that claims to be at all a complete vocabulary of the English language as ordinarily spoken and written. Many words now fully recognized as components of the language were only a few years ago looked upon as foreign. "Thus a critic of the date of 1799 speaks of an author as having "disfigured his pages with the French words fracas, route and trait," while Gray names together as French words advertisement, éclat, ennui, fracas, hâ̂tgout, raillery, and ridicule. Of the many words belonging to this class may be named collaborateur, millionaire, reverie, antique, cocoa, hammock, hurricane, potato and mufti, nearly all of which have become good English words.

5. hybrid compounds.

Hybrid compounds, i. e., words made up from two different languages, have, as a rule, been inserted, though, in many instances, not without hesitation, as in the case of diamondiferous. But English abounds in such words, in which occasionally, as in the case of interloper, which is half Latin and half Dutch, tbe two languages from which the word is made up are brought into strange conjunction. Similar instances are cablegram, daguerreotype, nonsense, somnambulist, peajacket, and many words beginning with the prefixes dis-, inter-, mis- anl over-. In all cases of hybrid compounds each word has had to be judged on its own merits.

II. ARRANGEMENT AND STYLE.

The style in which the Universal Dictionary has been compiled differs in many particulars from that of all its predecessors. An important lesson has been learned from a study of their deficiencies, and a strong effort made to add to the value of the present work in every detail. These special excellences of treatment may be concisely pointed out.

1. The adoption of various styles of type removes all difficulty in distinguishing the several divisions and subdivisions of the words. In these divisions it will be noted that a regular system, entirely original, has been adopted. Verbs, for instance, are first divided into transitive and intransitive. This division, while it may interfere with the historical order of the various meanings, has been adopted from its convenience for reference by the general reader. The transitive and intransitive divisions are next subdivided as follows: firstly, into meanings used in ordinary language; and, secondly, into technical uses. A further subdivision of each of these is then made into literal and figurative senses. Last of all come the phrases and idioms connected with zach verb. So far as the above divisions and subdivisions apply, the same course has been adopted in the case of nouns, adjectives and adverbs. Each word has been broken up into as many different meanings as can be discovered or are illustrated by quotations. Words of the same form, but from different roots, and therefore really different words, are placed under separate headings. The placing of such words under a single heading, as is often done in other dictionaries, gives readers a confused idea of their etymology, and may often lead them into serious errors.
2. The etymologies given in the present work are based on the best and latest authorities. The cognate forms of each word in other languages are shown distinct from the roots. This is an important feature, since in some of the leading dictionaries the roots and the cognate words or forms are mixed up in a way calculated to mislead and bewilder the retider, if unfamiliar with etymology, and often to make him conclude that the English word has been derived from the whole of the others.
3. The technology is almost as full as in works of special technical reference; so full; indeed, as almost to supersede the necessity for the use of dictionaries of technical terms, and to give to this work a manifold atility.
4. Quotations illustrative of every sense of every word are employed freely, and with as full references as it was possible to give. In this respect the Universal Dictionary far surpasses all its predecessors, inasmuch as in them, with very few exceptions, only the name of an author is given, reference being rarely mader to the name of the work quoted from, and still more rarely to the chapter, page or line of the book. Many quotations, it will be seen, are taken from newspapers and periodicals. But where can be found so many instances of words in every day use, well understood, and recognized in every way as elements of the English language, as in the columns of the press? It is hardly possible for an observant reader to take up any of the leading daily papers without coming across some word or phrase either wholly omitted from, or imperfectly explained in, our existing dictionaries. Colloquial words and phrases abound in them, and it will be noted that from them have been quoted, in the present work, a large number of technical terms connected with sporting, examples of which it would be difficult, if not impossible, to find elsewhere. The writers in our leading daily papers and periodicals are, in many, if not in most, cases far superior in their knowledge and use of the English language to the authors of many of the books published in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and are more entitled to be quoted as authorities for particular uses and meanings of words surviving in the same senses.
5. Illustrations are freely given where it has been considered that they would assist the reader to understand the word treated of. These, though finely made and artistic in character, are in no sense mere embellishments, but in every case help to elucidate the text.
6. The pronunciation of the words is shown by diacritical marks, the key to which is, for the sake of convenience, printed at the foot of each page. Special attention has been given to this highly important subject, the precise value of each vowel being indicated with a clearness and exactness that stand unrivalled among ordinary dictionaries. The common method is to mark only the vowels of the accented syllables. In the Universal Dictionary, every vowel has its sound indicated. "Every vowel sound must have some quality," we are told; "and no pronouncing dictionary can lay any just claim to completeness if it fails to tell what that sound is." This essential requisite has been most carefully attended to in the present work. Of the innumerable instances that might be adduced we shall give but one. The word anatomy, for instance, is ordinarily marked as follows: A-năt'-o-my. In the Universal Dictionary, it is marked An-ǎt'-óm- $\breve{y}$, each vowel being given its special sound, in accordance with the very full series of diacritical marks placed at the foot of the page.

In this work the current pronunciation has been adopted as the standard. "While speaking of pronunciation," says Dr. Murray, "I may refer to the great variety of pronunciation in many words and classes of words at present to be found; and also to the fact that the dictionary pronunciation of many words, as founded on the labors of Walker, Sheridan, Nares, Smart, Worcester, and other orthoepists, and found in most existing dictionarics and spelling books, is often obsolete in actual usage, and in the case of words specially irregular, replaced by one which is evidently founded upon the spelling." Some writers tell us that "there is no standard of pronunciation." There is, in truth, only one, that of "popular usage and nsage of English scholarship." This highest standard, the pronunciations in vogue among the cultivated people of the present day, is the one employed in the Universal Dictionary. It should be remembered that no orthoepist has the right to make pronunciations; his utmost privilege is to follow popular usage.

By lack of attention to this requisite many of the pronunciations given in dictionaries are obsolete, and many others have never had any warrant in actual usage. In the present werk the editors have taken no such liberties with language, their sole ambition having been to give correct English, as it is spoken by the most cultivated persons and in the most intellectual ranks of society.
7. Obsolete words, and those which are now rarely used in either written or spoken language, are distinguished in this work by an asterisk $\left(^{*}\right)$, and those which have been specially coined, or are seldom employed by modern writers and speakers, are marked by an obelisk ( $\dagger$ ). Cross-references are also inserted where required, and in many, cases the past tenses and past participles of the verbs are given in the various forms assumed by them.
8. The question of the insertion of compouna words in dictionaries is a most complicated and difficult one. The practice adopted in the Universal Dictionary is, to admit all such compounds or combinations of words as have acquired a special meanmg, not readily deducible from the individual meanings of the several words composing them. Of ordinary compounds, the meanings of which are sufficiently obvious, as being merely a combination of words each of which retains its original force, a brief selection has been given at the end of the principal word of the compound.
9. Proper names, when designating only certain definite individuals or places, are not given in the Universal Dictionary, it being aside from its purpose to make it a dictionary of biography or of geography. Words of this character have been admitted only when they could claim a place on special grounds; e.g.:-
(1) When, in addition to their original application, they have been given to some other object in uature. Thus Saturn is given on account of the plaset which bears his name.
(2) When they form the principal number of a compound word. Thus Aaron's rod (botanical) renders necessary the insertion of the name Aaron.
(3) When they are the names of any of the Books of the Bible; as Isaiah, or Jeremiah.

In the case of words which are derived directly from proper names, a brief account of the person in question is given, either in the etymological portion of the article, or in the definition. Thus a brief account of Arius is given under the word Arian.
10. The close of the twelfth century has been chosen as the limit of past time from which words could be selected as definitely English. At that time, English literature had fallen to its lowest ebb. The half century from 1150 to 1200 A . D. may be, so far as English literature is concerned, likened to the narrow tube connecting two funnels-the language widening backward into Anglo-Saxon, forward into English. This period, therefore, appears at once the proper and the most convenient one to start from. In fact, up to nearly the close of the twelfth century, there was little or no English literature, while by that time the old inflectional and grammatical system of Anglo-Saxon had practically disappeared. The year 1066, that of the Norman invasion, saw the beginning of the deepest mark graven both on our history and our speech. During the succeeding century the Latin element-through the channel of Norman French-made its way into English speech, inflectionalism in great measure disappeared, and the simplified system of modern English superseded the more complex grammatical methods of ancient speech. "Every time almost that we open our lips or write a sentence, we bear witness to the mighty change wrought in England by the Norman conquest." It is the close of this transition period, when English as it is now spoken first fairly began to be, and when English literature awakened to its modern growth, that appears to be the true starting point of existing English speech, and the Universal Dictionary may claim to present at once the geological development of the English language from its archæan period to the present time, and the natural history of recent English speech.
11. As regards spelling, no attempt has been made to introduce any phonetic system, the ordinarily accepted orthography being preferred. In truth, none of the several phonetic systems adrocated have been adopted by the people at large, and the Universal Dictionary aims only to present English as it is, not as word reformers would like it to be, or as it may become in some future time. As full a list as possible has been given under each word of the successive forms of orthography which it has assumed at various periods of its history, thus assisting the word in telling its own story. The abbreviations used are few and simple; a complete list of them is given.
12. What has been hitherto said is limited in great part to the value and advantage of this work as a dictionary of language. It seems proper to say something concerning its utility as an encyclopædia. In this feature it deals with a host of subjects not admitted to ordinary dictionaries, and gives a vast mass of information nowhere else to be found in so compact a form. It gives not only the spelling, pronunciation, etymology, and simple meanings of words, but their obsolete forms, their whole history, and their various uses and relations in ordinary, figurative, technical, scientific and classical language. Of this countless examples might be given. Let us take the word iron. First, we have the historic spelling of the word; second, its derivation; third, its cognate forms. Then the word is defined; first, in ordinary language; second, figuratively; third, technically, as employed in botany, in chemistry, in geology, in history, in mineralogy, and in pharmacy. Then follow the special compounds and their meanings, more than fifty being given which are not found in ordinary dictionaries, including such as iron-age, ironcage, iron-cross, iron-horse, iron-mask, iron-ore, iron-rations, etc.

In like manner, under the word chronology, we have Chinese and Japanese chronology; Hindoo chronology-historical and astronomical; Egyptian chronologyhistorical and astronomical; Greek, Roman, Jewish, Mohammedan, Christian, and Scientific chronologies, with a satisfactory account of each. In other dictionaries we find but a brief mention of the word in its ordinary signification.

The following supplementary information will be of importance in the use of this dictionary. The division of words into syllables has been made solely with reference to pronunciation, and does not indicate their etymology. In syllables wherein two or more vowels come together, not forming diphthongs, only that one of them which gives its sound to the syllable bears a diacritical mark, the others being treated as mute. Thus, in brĕad, sēa, fiōat, the $a$ is mute, the syllables being pronounced as if spelt, brĕd, sē, fiōt. Words of more than one syllable bear a mark upon the accented syllable, as $\hat{a l} l^{\prime}-t \underline{e} r$.

The Etymology will be found inclosed within brackets immediately following each word. To understand the plan adopted, let it be noted (1) that retrogression is made from modern languages to ancient; and (2) that when after a word there appears such a derivation as this: "In Fr . . , Sp . . . , Port . . . , Ital . . . from Lat . . .," the meaning is, not that it passed through Italian, Portuguese, Spanish and French before reaching English, but that there are or have been analogous words in French, Spanish, Portuguese and Italian, all derived, like the English, from a Latin original.

We have here pointed out some of the features of excellence of the Universar Dictionary, many of them unique in a dictionary of language, while the whole give it a comprehensive value which pertains to no other work of the kind. It is, in short, a library in a work, and can safely be offered alike to the busy student and the general reader as indispensable for their purposes and literary pursuits.

PREFATORY NOTE.

The principal points in which the Usiversal Dictionary differs from other dictionaries are fully disussed in the Preface, but it may be well to draw attention to the following:
(1) Compound Words are inserted under the first element of the compound, and not in the place they would occupy in strictly alphabetical order, if the second element were taken into account. Thus Ant-bear is inserted after ANT, and not after Antatrophic.
(2) The Pronunciation is indicated by diacritical marks, a key to which will be found at the foot of the severai pages, but the division into syllables has been based solely on pronunciation, and with no reference to the etymology of the word. In syllables wherein two or more vowels come together, not forming diphthongs, only that one of them which gives its sonnd to the syllable bears a diacritical mark, the others being treated as mute. Thus, in bread, sea fioat, the $a$ is mute, the syllables being pronounced as if spelt $b r \varepsilon d$, sè, fōt. Words of more than one syllable bear: mark upon the accented syllable, as $a l^{\prime}$-ter.
(3) The Etymology will be found enclosed within brackets immediately following each word. To understand the plan adopted, let it be noted (1) that retrogression is made from modern languages to ancient; and (2) that when after a word there appears such a derivation as this-"In Fr. . . . Sp. . . . Port. . . . Ital. . . . from Lat. . . .," the meaning is, not that it passed throngh Italian, Portuguees, Spanish and French before reaching English, but that there are or have been analogous words in French, Spanish, Portuguese and Italian, all derived, like the English, fror a Latin original.

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS.

The following List, which contains the principal abbreviations emploged in the Universal Diotionarmis is inserted here for the convenience of persons using the work for the first time. A full list, containing also the chid abbreviations in general use, will be given at the end of the final volume.

Universal Dictionary  OF THE  ENGLISH LANGUAGE

A

A. The first letter in the English alphabet, as is those of all the modern Indo-European with a, and the Greek with a similar letter, a (alpha) Is Sanacrit the vowels are classified by grammarians separately from the consooants. The vowels sre placed first, and two oants. The vowels sre placed irss, and two diate betweean ard and $\check{u}$, as in the word Veda, diate betweea a and a, as in the word and the other loog, as in the frst aylic, slso, more accurstely called the Syro-Arsbiaa, family of languages, a letter with the a sound atands first in order. Thus the Hebrew alpbabet commences with N (Aleph), followed io auceession by 1 (Beth), 1 (Gimel), 7 (Daleth), deaignationa which st oace auggeat the nsmes of the Greek letters Alpha, Beta, Gomma, Delta. The compsrstive originality of the Hebrew The compsristive oris shown by the fact that the sppellationa of the letters have meanings which the original of the letters have meanings which the original forms of the charscters are supposed roughly torms of the charscters are aupposed roughly to repreaent: thus, ( Aleph) signiflee aa ox, (Daleth) a house, (Gimel) s camel, sad 7 (Daleth) a door. These terma are properly Aramean. The old Hebrew, the Aramzan, and the Greek letters seem to have come from the Phoenician, a Syro-Arabian toague. The Phoenicisn letters, sgaia, as Gesenius suggests, may bave beea derived from the Egyptian hieroglyphics. [Alphabet.] The arrangement Which makes A the first letter extends far beyond the Aryan and Syro-Arsbisa tongues, and is believed to be pearly universal through the world.
I. A as a vowel sound.

A owes its position st the head of ao many alphabets to the facility with which it masy be pronouaced: it is needful but to breath atrongly through the opea mouth, sad oae of the a sounda comes forth. This letter has three leading sounds, two of which sgaiu sre monewhat modified in msuy words, sppsrently by the succeediog consonants.

1. The long sound of $\mathbf{A}$ :
(i.) As in fate, marked in thia work by $\overline{\mathbf{a}}$
(ii.) A modification of this sound, produced by the consonant $r$ followiug it, as io fore, marked ä.
2. The open sound of $\mathbf{A}$ :
(i.) As io father (insrked a). Thia, or a eound much spproachiog it, is common in many languages

If A trifling modification of this sound is produced by its occurrencs in a cloaed ayllsble, as in fast, but it ia not sufficiently distiac from it to require a special diacritical mark (ii.) A shorter form of the open sound in a closed syllable, as in fot. It is here marked $\mathbf{a}$. (iii.) The shortest possible sound of $A$, scarcely distinguishable from one of the $u$ sounds, as in amidst. It is here marked a. It is very common in Sanserit words, as Vedia.
3. The broad sound of A :
(i.) As in fall, here marked $\hat{\mathbf{a}}$
(ii.) A closer form of it, marked $\tilde{\boldsymbol{a}}$, as in thatt.
II. A as an initial is used-ăb'-bey̆, s. [O. Fr. abeie, abaie; Fr. abbafe, from Low Lat. abbatia; Ital. abbadia or badia; Ger. abtei.]

1. A monastic community. A society of celibates of either aex, who, having withdrawn from "the world " and bound themselves by religioua vowa, henceforth live in seclusion, the mea, terned monks, in a convent, and the females, denominated nuns, in a numnery, the former ruled over by an abbot [Aввот], and the latter by an abbess. Originally the term abbey was applied to all such fraternities or sisterhoods, then it became more limited in meaning, as a distinction was drawn between meaning, as a distinction was drawn between an abbey proper and a priory. The more an abbey proper and a priory. The more throw out offshoots, as a vigoroua church now is pretty sure to found one or more humbler churches in its vicinity. These were called priories, and were ruled by priors, which was a more modest dignity than that of abbot. For a period they were subject to the anthority of the abbot by whose instrumentality they had been founded, then they gained streagth and became independent of the parent monastery, and finally the distinction between an abbey and a priory alnost tion between an abbey a vanished. [Monasterv.]
2. A buildiag either now or formerly inhabited ty a monastic community. An abbey in the Middle Ages had a church, a dormitory, a refectory for meals, a proper pantry for viands, and all other conveniences for the monks, who, though individually poor, were collectively rich. It stood in the midst of grounds walled round for protection and grounds privacy. Some abbeys have been converted into modern cathedrals or churchea, others into modern cathedrals or churchea, others are in ruius. [Priory, Convent, NunNery, are in ruius.

[Aeber, Prioky.]
When in the fourth century, A.D., the scattered and aolitary monks living in the Egyptian and other deserts began to be gathered into small communities, each society elected a spiritual chief over it, to whom the name abbot was given by the Syriaus and othera, and archimandrite by the Greeks. The hishop soon gained the right of confrming the nomination. As yet the abhots were deemed laymen, but about the sixth century most of them became prieats. Atter the second Niceas became priests. Atter the second Nicede Council, in A.D. 787 , they were allowed to counci, in A.D. 78, they were allowed to consecrate monks for the lower sacred ordera.
The abundant leisure which they possessed led a few of them to become learned men, and the bishops tinding them useful in controversiea with " hereties," gradually induced them to remove their monssteries to the vicinity of towas. By the eleventh ceatury their influence had so increased that the more powerful of them sncceeded in shaking off the authority of the bishops, owning no jurisdiction now but that of the Pope; these were, in consequeace, called insulated. abbots. Though nominally the aext grade below bishops, yet most of them adopted the eyiscopal crosier which, however, they bore is their right land while the hishops did so in their lett. They also assumed mitrea like their rivals, and evea many ordinary abbots became crosiered; thus a diatinction arose between mitred and crosiered abbots. The houses presided over by insulated abbots had mostly sent forth priories; the heads of those which had done so on a large seale were aometimes called car dinal abbots; and the ambitious title of acumenical, meaning universal abbot, imitated from the patriarch of Constantiaople, was not unknown. The privilege of making appointunknown. The privilege of making appointments to posts of auch innportance was

[^3]claimed, and in many placea successfully, by the civil power, which then nominated laymen for secular ends. Hence arose abbot-counts (in Lat. abba-or abbi-comites) and reld-abbots (in Lat. abbates milites), who received appointin Lat. abbates miltes), who received applitary menta on condition of rendering military gervice for what was deemed their feof. In Germeny 1here were prince abbots, and Kings Philip I. and Louls VI. of France
In England, before the Reformation, twentysix or twenty-geven mitred abbots, with two priors, sat in the House of Lords; the former were called, in consequence, abbots-general, or abbots-sovereign. They ceased to be peers when the monasteries were suppressed by When the mory

Abdominal regions: Certain regions on the arternal surface of the abdomen formed by the tracing upon it of imaginary lines. A line is drawn harizontaily from the extremity of the last rib on one side to the same point on the other. A second line is then drawn parallel to the first between the two anterior superior processes of the ilinm. These two lines necessarily divide the abdomen into three horizontal bands or zones. The first or highest one is called the epygastriom [EPigastaium]; the gecond or middle one, the umbilical region [Umbilical]; and the third or lowest the hypogastrium [Hypogastrium]. Two vertical lines are then drawn on either side from the cartilagg of the seventh rib downward to the anterior superior spine of the ilium. These necessarily intersect the three horizontal zones, dividing each of them into three parts so as to make nine in all. The central division of the epigastrium constitutes the epigastric region, properly so called, on either side of which lie the right and left hypochondria [1lypochondrial. The central portion of the umbilical region is the umbilical region properly so called; whilst the compartments on either sida are named the right and left ab-jür-ā-tion, s. [In Fr. abjuration; Sp. abjuracion; Lat. abjuro = to deny on oath, to abjure : $a b=$ from; juro $=$ to awear.]

I. The act of forswearing, abjuring, or ranouncing upon oath; a denial upon oath, a renunciation upon oath. Chiefly a law term, and used in the following sensea:-

1. An ahjuration of the realm. During tho Middle Ages the right of sanctuary was conceded to criminals. A person fleeing to a church or churchyard might permanently eacape trial, if, after confessing himself guilty before tha coroner, ha took an oath abjuring the kingdom, i.e., promising forthwith to embark, at an assigned port, for a forelgn land, and never to return unless by tha king's permisslon. By this abjuration tha blood of the eriminal was attainted, and he forfeited all his goods and chattels. brought into the House of Commons." Givt. Eng., ch. Xv.
The oath of abjuration was fixed by 13 Wm. III., c. 16 . By the 21 & 22 Vict., c. 48 , one form of oath was aubatituted for the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration. For this form another was substituted by tha Act $30 & 31$ Vict., c. 75, a. 5. This has in turn been suleerseded by the Promissory Oaths Act, 31 & 32 Vict., c. 72 , by which a new form of the oath of allegiance is provided.
3. An abjurstion, renunciation, or retractation of real or imagined heresy or false doctring. Thua the now abolished 25 Chaa. II., c. 2, enacted that certain tenets of the Church of Rome wera to be solemnly renounced. This is sometimes called an Ahiuration Act, but the term is more appropriately confined to that mentioned under No. 2.

2. Poek.: For abstracted; absent in mind, like one in a trance (pron. ab-străct ${ }^{*}$ )

3. Separate; existing in the mind only hence with the seose of difficult, abstruse.
II. Logic and Grammar:

1. In a strict sense: Expressing a particular property of any person or thing viewed apart from the other properties which him or it. Thus depth is an abstract term Used of the sea, it means that the property of the sea expressed by the word depth is viewed apart from the other propertiea of the acean. So is blueness an abatract word. In íhis senst abstract is opposed to moncrete. This use of the term was introduced by tha Schoolmen, and was hirgly approved by Mr. John Stuart Mill, who employed tha word in no other sense in his "Logic.

Abstract Nouns: The last of the five classes into which nouns may be divided, the other heing (1) proper, singular, or meaningless nouns; (2) common, general, or aigniflcant nouns; (3) coilective nouns; and (4) material nouns. Most abstract nouns are derived from adjectives, as whiteness from white, height from high, roundness from round; thesa are called adjective cbstract nouns, or adjective abstracts. Others come from verbs, as creation from create, and tendency from tend thon from create, and tendency from tend; these are denominated terbal abstract nowns, or werbal abstracts. Abstract nouns have properly no plural. When used ia the plural this is an indication that they have lost their abstract character and gained a concrete meaning, so that they are now common or general nouns. (See Fainis Higher Eng. Gram.)
2. In a loose sense: Resulting from the mental facuity of abostraction, gencral as op posed to particular. The teran is used even when the idea conceived of as separate from ail others with which it is associated is not a quality. In this aense reptile, star, and money are abstract or general words, though none of the three is a quality. Locke did much to bring this looser aense of the word into currency. It la censured by John S. Hill (Logic, Bk. I., ch. 11., \& 4). The mind makes the partlcular idens recelved from particular objects to become geoeral which fis done by conadering them ar they are in the miod, auch sppearances, separate from all other existernce and the circumstanres of real existence, is time abseraction, whereby ideas taken from particulta leings becoma qeneral representatives of all of the dens"-Locke: Fumman Enderstanding. bl. ii. ch $x \mathrm{i} . \mathrm{s}$ : $\dagger$ Abstract science: $\mathbf{A}$ term applied to mathematics.

Abstract or Pure Mathematics: Mathematics, which treata of number or quantity viewed as standing alone, as is done in geometry and arithmetic. It is contradistinguished from mixed mathematics, in which these are viewed as modified by the physical properties of the bodies in which they inhere. This is done in mechanics, hydrostatics, optics, &e.

Abstract Numbers: Numbers considered in themselvea without reference to any persons or things with which they may be confoined things with Which they may be conjomed joined with men it becomes concrete.
B. Used as a substantive:

1. Logic: An abstract name, as opponed to one which if concrete. [See Concrete.]
"Each of them [or the soncrete terina] has or might have acorresponding slustract name to demote covicrete 'like'. han fits abstract 'Ilkeness;' the con erete ' 'father' and , oon' have or tnight' have the aburacts 'patornity' and flitety or alliation" Logic, p. 45
In the abstract, or (less frequently) in abstract, qignifies in a atata of separation, the looking at an idea apart from all other ideas with which it may be more or less intimately comnected. It is opposed to in the concretes which, however, is rarely used.

II. Tech. (in Logic) : A scbolastio term. employed when false conclustons are illogically deduced from the premises of the opponent. In this sense it is sometimes used in what are known as indirect demonstrations of pro poeitions $\ln$ geometry, where the proposition Is shown to be true, by proving that any supposition to the contrary would lead to an ahsurdity: as, "Becansa in the triangle CBD the side $\mathbf{B} C$ is equal to the side $B \quad D$, the angle $B \mathbf{D} C$ is equal to the angle $\mathbf{B} \mathbf{C} \mathbf{D}$ but B D C bee been proved to be greater than the sams B C D; therefore the angle B D C is st the eame time equal to, and greater than the angle B C D, which is ebsurd." The terin is borrowed from the Latin absurdum in the phrase "reductio ad absurdum" (q.v.). Im possible, however, is more frequently used in this way than absurd.

*I. Primarily, it signifled the same as the Greek mpoaydia (prosôdia), viz., a musical intonation used by the Greeka in reading and speaking.
II. Now (in general language)

1. The laying of particular + stress upon a certain syllable or certain syilables in a word; or an inflaction of the voice which gives to each syllable of a word its due pitch with respect to beight or lowness. In a dissyllable there is but one sccent, as a-back', but in a polysyllable there are more than one. In transubstantiation there are properiy three -tran'sub-stan'ti-a'tion. One of these, how-ever-that on the fifth syllable, the $a$ just before-tion-is greater than the rest, and is called the primary accent; the othera ara called secondary. There is a certain analogy between acceat and emphasia, emphasis doing between acceat and emphasia, emphasis doing for whole words or clauses of sentencea what accent does for single syllables.
2. Certain diacritical marks borrowed from the Greeks, and deaigned to regulate the force of the voice in proauaciation or for other uses. They are three in number: the acute accent ('), designed to note that the voice shonld ('), designed to note that the (hoice should be raised; the grave accent ( ${ }^{\text {depsed } \text {; and the circumex ( } \sim \text { or } A \text { ), }}$ which properly combines the characters of the two accents already named, that the voice should be first raised and then depressed The acute and grave accents are much used in French, but to discriminate sounds, as elite, creme; and the circumflex of the form $A$ is frequently employed in Latiu to discriminate the ablative of the first declension, as perina from the nomiaative penna.

- Accents and otber diacritical marks occur also in English. Sometimes the former are employed to regulate the stress of the voice; sometimes, again, they are employed for other purposes.
Specially:
(a) Geom. \& Alg. : Lettera, whether capital or small, are at times accented, particnlarly when there is a certain relation between the magnitudes or quantities which they represent Thus, for example, the line A a may be coro pared with the line $A^{\prime} B^{\prime}$, and the quantity $x y$ with $x^{\prime} y^{\prime}$.
(b) Trig.: Accents mark minutes and seconds of a degree : e.g., $30^{\circ} 16^{\prime} 37^{\prime \prime}$.
(c) Hor: : Accents are sometimes used to denote minutes and seconds of an hour : e.g. 6 h. $7^{\prime} 14^{\prime \prime}$.
(d) Engineering: Feet and inches, and similar measures of length, are often noted by similar measures of length, are often not accents : thns, $3^{\prime} 10^{\prime \prime}=3$ feet 10 inches.

3. Mode of speaking or pronunciation, with especial reference to dialectic peculiarities.

The broadest accent of bis province."-Macaulay

- Poetry: Sometimes used for the language of a nation or race.

How many ages hence
In
In states unborn and accenta yet uuknown."
Shakesp.: Jul. Cusar, ii. L
4. Sometimes without reference to dialectic peculiarities.
"Accent is a kind of chaunting; all men have arcent

5. In the plural: Words. Chiefly in poctry, but also in prose.
$\begin{aligned} & \text { But when he speaks, What elocution flowa: } \\ & \text { soft as the fleeces of descending snows. }\end{aligned}$
The copious accents fall, with tasy art

-In Poetry: Sometimes succially a vocal accompaniment to instromental music.

Well touch'd, "Not by by chords alone Cowper: Transl. of Milton's Lat. Foom to his rither. 6. Mod. Musio: The strain which recurs at regnlar intervala of time. Its josition dicated by upright atrokes called bars first note inside a har is always accored When the bars contain more than one grou, of notes, which happens in compound time other accents of lesser force occur on the firs note of each group: these are called secondary or subordinate accents, whilst that just insid the bar is termed the primary or principa accent. Other accents can be prodnced at any point by the use of the sign $=$ or sf. Thi throwing of the accent on a normally unac cented portion of the bar is called symonation. A proper grouping of accents will produce rhythm. It is considered a fault if an accanted musical note falls on a short syllable (Stainer and Barrett: Dictionary of Musical Terms.)

A. of persons:

Law: One who ia not the chief actor in an offence nor present at its commission, but still is connected with it in aome other way. Accessories may become so before the fact or after the fact. Sir Matthew Hale deflnes an accessory before the fact as one who, being absent at the time of the crims committed, doth yet procurs, counsel, or command another to commit a crime. If the procurer be present when the evil deed is being done, he is not an accessory, but a principal. An accessory after the foct is one who, knowing a falony to have been conmitted, receives, relievss, comforts, and assiats the felon. In high treason of a pronounced character there are no accessoriea, all are principals. In petit treason, murder, and feloniss, there may be aceessorios; except only in those offences which, by judgnent of law, ars sudden and nuremeditated, as manslaughter and the like, which, therefore, cannet have any accessorieg before the fact. So too in petit larceny, and in all crimes umder the degree of felony, there are no accesgories either before or after the filet; but all persons concerned therein, if guilty at all, are principals. (Blackstone: Commentaries, bk.iv., chap. iii.)
"For the law of prinelpal and acceasory, as respects high treazon, then Ras, and is to this day, in a state felony, a distinctlon, founded on justice aud reason, is wide between the princlpal and the a ceessory after knows to be a nurlerer is Hanhle to punishnuent, but not to the punishrment of ruarder. He on the other hiand, who shelters one whom he knows to le a traitor is, sconiling to all our juriat guilty of high treason," -sacaulay: Hite. Kng., ch. V.
2. Ord. Lang. (somewhat figuratizely): One who sbets or countenances anything which is wrong, whether human law consider it a crime or no.

1. Achromatic Telescope: The name given by Dr. Bevis to an improved form of the refracting telescope constructed by Dollond in 1761. When a single lens is used for the object-glass of a telescope, the image of the object is fringed with colour, and hence high magnifying powers cannot be used, unless the foeal leugth of the lens is very considerable. Slr Isaac Newton, from experiments made on the refrangibility of light, had erroneously concluded that the size of the object-glassea of refrscting telescopes could not be enlarged of refrscting telescopes could not be enlarged beyoud three or fonr inches (APERTUnEf: for this reason he turned bis attention to reflected this reason he turned bis attention to reflected light, in which the image of the object is light, in which the image of the object ls uncoloured. Reflecting telescopes of the uncoloured. Reflecting telescopes of the generally nsed. In the middle of the last century, Dollond, a Spitalfields wesver, undertook a course of experiments with the object of ascertaining the correctness of Newton's statements. His researches were rewanded by the valuable discovery that by using two different kinds of glass, sind giving to the surfaces of each lens s different curvature-the faces of each lens s different curvsture-the focal lengths of the two lenses being in a focal lengths of the two lenses being in a certain ratio-an image of the object conld be obtsined free from colonr ; while, by a akilful obtsined free from colour; while, by a akilful arrangement of the radii of the surfaces of each glass, the errors srising from spherical aberration [AbERRATION] could be entirely removed. In the early teleacopea made by Dollond and bis son Peter, the object-glass was naually s double concave lens of flint enclosed between two convex glasses of crown (Fig. 1); but modern objectglasaes have only a concave ena of flint combined with a convex of crown or plate (Fig. 2). A century ago flint-glass of a size suitable for large teleacopes conld not be obtained ; but more recently the removal of the excise duty, snd the success attained by Guinand and others in glass manufacture, have ensbled English snd forelgn opticians to construct scbromatic telescopes of considerable magnitude, with object-glasses of twelve, filteen, and even twenty-six inches diameter, the area of aperture haviag the property of increasing in a considersble property of increasing in a considersble ratio the power of the telescope to penetrate ratio the power of the telescope to penetrate lnto space and render visible the minutest lnto space and render visible the minutest objects. Achromatic telescopes, from their objects. Achromatic telescopes, from their convenient gize and comparative cheapness, convenient aize and comparative cheapness, have been and still are generslly used by astronomers in Great Britain, Europe, snd America, and by their aid many modern coveries have been made. So perfect ia the imsge formed by a well-corrected achromatic object-glass, that almost any magnifying power can be applied; and thua a telescope of this form tbree or four feet in length is auperior in its definition and surpasses in magnflying in its definition and surpasses in magniying power one of the old nnwieldy teleacopes 100 Feet long. The eye-glasses of the telescone also require to be free from colour snd aberalso require to be free from colour snd aberration, and the correction of these defects is ration, and the correction of these defects is accomplished by an arrangement of the lenses forming the eye-picce. [See Eye-piece, Ornect OLass, Aplanatic.]
2. Achromatic Aficroscope: In a compound microscope an image of the object is first formed by the objective, and afterwards enlarged by the leuses constituting the eye piece. Till abont the year 1830 the objectglasses of microscopes were mostly formed of single or combined lenses, the apprturea of which, in order to obtain a diatinct image of the object, were exceedingly small. The labours of modern opticians to adapt the achromatic principle to compound inicroscopes were rewarded by the construction of lenses in which the images of objects were rendered distinct in their minute details even when high magnitying powers were spplied. when high magnitying powers were spplienl. In a modern microscapic objective, not only is the colour corrected and the image rce from distortion, but by an increase in the from distortion, of aperture [ANaLE of APERTURE] the penetrating power of the objective is con siderably increased, and less magnitying power is required from the eye-piece. With s good objective of one-eighth of an inch focus, magnifying powers ranging from 450 to 1,200 diameters can be obtained by using different eye-pieces. [Obuective.]

5. Chem.: A salt of hydrogen in which the hydrogen can be replaced by a metal, or can, with a basic metallic oxide, form a salt of that metal and water. Acid oxilcs of the came element are distinguished hy the termination of cous and -ic-as sulphurous and sulpharic-the latter contsining the and sulpharic-the latter containing anhydrides. They unite with water and form scids having the same terminations. By replace ment of the bydrogen by a metal they form salts distinguished by the terminations -it and -ate respectively. These acids ars called oxygen acids; formerly it was thonght that all acids contained oxygen, thls element being regarded as the acidifying principle (gencrat ing acid). But many scids sre formed by direct anion of hydrogen with an element, as hydrochloric scid ( HCl ), hydrosulphuric acid $\left(\mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{~S}\right)$, or with an organic radical as bydrocyanic acid, H(CN). Acids which are soluble in water redden bline litmus and have a sour taste. Acids are said to be monobasle dibasic, tribasic, sc., according as one, two, or thres stoms of hydrogen can be replaced by a metal. Organic acids can be produced by the oxidation of an alcohol or aldehyde. They contain the monad radical HO OC), once if they are monobasic, twice if dibasic, de They are also classed as monotomic, diatomic, sc, according as they are derived from a monatomic or diatomic alcohol, se Acids derived from a distomic sleohol can be slcohol acids or aldehyde acids. [See Glucol. Many orcanic acids occur in the juices of vegetables, some in soimsis, as formic acid in snts.

The former method is carried out by ascertaining the measured quantity of a atandard alkaline aolution required to saturate a given volumo of the acid. That by weight analysia can be effected in more ways than one. A convenient one is to decompose a known weight of the acid with an excess of acid carbonate of aodium or potassium, and estimate by weight the quantity of carbonic anhydride wevolved. When this is done the quantity of real acid can without difficulty be ascertained. (Hatts: Chemistry.)

(20'-ón-ite,s. [Lat. aconitum (q.v.).] 1. A name of the commen Blue Monk'ghood (Aconitum napellus). It occurs wild in Carinthia and Carniola, and, having long been cultivated in British gardens, has escaped and become naturalised in Eugland. It is a very poisonous plant, the root being especially dangeroua. When the leaves and flowers have died away, the root, or root-stock, has sometimes been mistaken for that of horse-radish, and has been eaten with fatal results. The root is of tapering form, and when old is dark brown outside and white inside, whilst the young ones are much paler. Its taste is bitter at first, after which there is a numbness and tingling of the lips and tongue. The rootatock of the horse-radish (Cochlearia a maraca) is much larger than that of the aconite, anul does not taper. Externally it is of a dirty yellow colour, and marked at the top by transverse scars, left behind by the leaves. Its taste is at first acrid or pungent, not bitter. [Aconitum.]

a-cous'tics, or a-côus'tícs, s. [In Fr. acoustique.] [Acoustici i A term introduced by Saveur. The acience which treata of sounds, or, more specifically, that braneb of natural philosophy which treata of the nsture of sound and the laws of ita production and propagation, as far as these depend on physical principles. Sound is produced by the vibration of the particles in a sonorous body, evoked by a blow or in some other way. If a number of small light wooden balls be suspended by ailk threads over a bell-jar, just in contact with the widest part of the glass, the drawing of a violin-bow across the edge of the glass will impart to the particles of the latter a vibratory movement. which will make itself visibla by finging of the balls oftener than once. Sound requires an elastic medium for ita transmission to the tympanum of the ear. In vacero it becomea insudible, but brought in contact with sir it is heard without difinculty. Its rete of progresa through dry air, at a tempersture of $32^{\circ}$. is, sccording to Vauder Kolk, 1,091 feet 8 inches in a second; and according to Mr. Stone, $1,090 \cdot 6$ feet: through metallic rods ita motion is much more rapid.
Two particles which sre in the same atate of vibration-i.e., are equally displaced from the positions which they occupled in equilibrio, and are moving in the asme direction, and with equal veloeities-are said to be in the same phase; whilst those which are proceeding in a contrary direction are said to be in opposite phases.
If ths vibration of particles takes place in the same direction as that in which the distarbance is moving from particle to particle, it is called longitudinal; ff at right anglea to it, transverse.
So analogous are the sound-producing vibretions of particles to those of waves in the ocean, thist the terms waves and undulations are used in Acoustics as well as in Hydrology. The distance which aeparates two particles in the sams phase is called the length of a wave. $\Delta$ in optics, so in Acoustics, there are refraction and reflection, the laws in both cases being the same.
Refraction of sound: The change of direction which is produced when a wave of sound, travelling through one medium, neets asecond ons not of the same kind, snd excites in it a wave of a different velocity and direction from wave of a the firat.
Refection of sound: The change of direction which is produced when a wave of sound, travelling through one medium, meeta a second one diverse from the first, and in addition to transmitting to it a refracted wave, excites in it an undulation travelling in a different direction, but with the ssme velocity as the other. A sound msy be frequently repeated, as from an echo-producing cliff, sud in a whispering gallery or a tunnel.
Two or more sonorous waves travelling through the same medium, and acting ou the aame particles, are said mutually to interfers with each other. If they move towards such su interference from exactly opposite directions, they produce between thema stationary wave. This expreasion does not imply that every particle of the wave thus produced io motionless. Some particles are 80, whilat others vibrate longitudinally or transversely. The pointa at which the particles are stationary are called nodes, and the vibratory portions ventrat segments. A vibrating musjical string, a tuning fork, or other stiff rod vibrating longitudinally, make stationary waves. These sre generated also inside wind-instruments when the latter are blown. The vibrations of a solid are beat conmunicated to another solid : hence s tuning-fork being struck is applied to a table, and violin-strings sre placed in contact with a hollow wooden box, which imparts to their sound a greater intensity than if its transmission to the esr were eutrusted to the sir alone.
Noise is a single blow given to the ear, whilst Music is caused by a series of feebl's Whows following one another st regular Intervals. [Nusic, Harmony, socnd.]
I Some writers have divided Acoustics Into Diacoustics, which treats of those sounds which pass directiy from the sonorous body to the ear; and Catacoustics, which inveatigates the phenomena of reflected sounda. Another division is into Acoustics proper, or the science of hearing, and Phonetics, or ths science of sound; the latter word being from Gr. фwvin $(p h o ̄ n \bar{e})=$ sound.

2. Technically

(a) Nat. Phia. • The exertion of a force by one material body upon another. It may be by contact or by percussion. In either case it is met by resistance precisely equal to that produced by itself, or, in Ihilosuphica language, artion and re-action are equal and contrary; that is, they are equal in force and contrary in direction. If an elastic ball he struck against the ground, action compresses it, and reaction brings it back again to its natural shape. When birds fiy, the action produced by the strokes of their wings 1 ronduces a contrary reaction on the part of the air, and it is this reaction which carries them forward.

(d) Law:
(1.) Eng. Law: The form prescribed by law for the recovery of one's due, or the lawful demand of one's right. Aetions are divided into civil and criminal; the former are called also prosecutions, and are divided into three classes-(1) Personal Actions, by which a man claims a deht or personal duty to him, or damages in lieu of it. These again are subdivided into Actions cx contractu, as for debt, promises, covenant, &c., and Actions ex delicto, or torts, as negligences, trespass, and nuisance. (2) Real or Feodol Aetions, concerning real property only, in which the plaintift called in this relation the demandant, claims a title to lands, tenements, or rents. (3) Afixed Actions, partaking of the character of both; as, for example, when some real pro perty is demanded, and, in sddition to this personal damages for a wrong sustained, such, for instance, as ejectment. There are many kinds of actions ranked under these three classes. Criminal Actions consist o prosecutions and actions penal to recover some jenalty under statute.

The practice of adulteration must, more or lesa, have prevalled in avery country, and in all but the most primitive ages. In England, as early as the thirteenth century, the legislature attempted, though with but partial auccess, to atrike a blow against it, in the Act 5I Henry IlI., stat. 6, often quoted as the "Pillory and Tumbril Act." Themethods of debasing saleabie articles which were adopted in thoss early times were few and aimple; it was not till a comparatively recent period that the more ingesious forma of adulteration began to prevail. Once having taken root, however, they a00n flourished greatly. Between 1851 and 1854, and even on to 1857, a sanitary commission on tbe adulteration of food, inatituted in connection with the Lancet newapaper, and moat ably conducted by Dr. Arthur Hill Hassall, made revelations of ao startling a character thst parliamentary action took place on the subject. The firat jegisla. tive measure which followed-that of 1860 was a complete failure, the act being ineffcient and useless. A atronger enactment was consequently pasaed in 1872. It was entitled "An Act to Amend tha Law for the Adulteration of Food, Drink, and Drugg." Under this Aet many prosaeutions and convictions took place; but owing to the aeller being entirely in the handa of ths analyat, there being no appeal from his certificate, a feeling of diasatisfaction and distrust aroae in the minda of manufacturers and tradera, and another set was demanded. This, which came into force in 1875, gava the right of appeal to into force in 1875, gava the right of appeal to the Laboratory, Someraet House, in cases in which the correctness of the local analyst's certificate was disputed. In 1869 an Act had been pasaed to restrain the adulteration of seeds.
The most notable kinds of adulteration are the following:-lat The addition of a substance of inferior value for the sake of adding to the bulk and weigbt of one more prectioua, as the mixing of water witb milk, fat with lutter, or of chicory with coffee. 2nd. The addition of a substance with the viaw of leightening the a substance with the viaw of heightening tha article, as well aa to conceal other forms of adulteration. Example: The colouring of adulteration. Example: The colouring of pickles or yreservea with aalts of copper. 3rd. or increase the flavour or pungency of another. Example : The addition to vinegar of sulphuric acid. 4th. The addition of a suhstance deaigned to ensure that a larger quantity of another one shall be conaumed. Example: Beer, one of the chief adulterants of which st present is aalt, put into the liquor to easure that when one employa it to slake hia thirat, the more he drinka the more thirsty will he become. Soms of the substancea used for adulterating articles of food-the aalts of copper and aulphuric acid for inatance-are Loisonous; but Mr. Harkness, F.C.S, of the Laboratory, Somerset Honse, who has had much experience in adalysing apecimens sent thither on appeal, considers that at present adulteration does not prevail ao extensively as the public believe, and that, as a rule, the purchaser of $\mathbf{s}$ debased article is more likely to suffer in purse than in health.

B. Technically:
I. In the old German empire: A person appointed by the emperor to do justice. Germany and elsewhere juridical advocates were made judges in consequence of their attendiog when causes were pleaded in the count's court.
II. In the Mcalicerat Church: One appointed to defend the rights and revenues of a charch or monastery. The word odvocate, intthe sense of a defeader of the church, was nitimately superseded by that of patron, but it still lingers in the term advowson. [ADvowson]

Constitutional adrocates, in Rome, pleaded before the consistory in cases relating to the disposat of benefices whieh they opposed.
Elective advocates were chosen by a bishop, an abbot, or a cliapter.

Feudal advocates were persons asaigned lands on condition of their fighting for the Charch, leading out their vassals for the purpose.
Matricular advocates defended the cathedral churches.

Military advocates wers appointed to fight for the Church. [See also Abvocatus.]

Devil's Advocate. [Advocatos, Fra.]
III. In English Law:

1. Originally: One who pleaded a cause in a civil, but not in a criminal court Formerly, certain persons called advocates, learned in the ciril and canon law, were alone entitled to plead as connsel in the English ecclesiastical and admiralty courts but these are now thrown open to the ordi nary bar. (Will: Wharton's Law Lexicon.)
2. Now: One who pleads a canse in any court, civil or crininal. It is not, properly apeaking, a technical word, but is ased onls in a popular sense, as synonyinous with barrister or connsel. [Couvael; Aovocate, A. 1.]

The Queen's Adrocate was a member of the College of Advocates, whose office it was to advise and act as counsel for the Crown in questions of civil, caaon, and international law. He ranked next to the solicitor-General. (Will: Wharton's Law Lexicon.)

At stations of the army the judge-adverate is the officer throngh whom prosecntions before courts-martial are conducted. There is also a Judge-Advocate-General for the army at large.
IV. In Scotland :

1. Law: $A$ member of "the faculty of advocates," or Scottish bar. These have not derived their privilegea from any Act of Parliament incorporating them fato a society, but have possessed them from a period of nuascertained antiquity The association is formed on the model of thst or the French avocats, and, like it, is presided over by a dean, or doyen.

Law: The right of presentation to vacant bencfice, what is called in Scotland patronage [Patronage] This is of three kinds: (1) Presentation, when the patron has a right to present clergyman to the bishop for institution; (2) collation, when the bishop is himself the patron of the living; and (3) donation, when the king or a salject, acting under the royal licence, founds a church or chapel on the footing that it shali be subject to his visitation only, and not be phaced under the bishop, and that he (the patron) shall havs the power of putting a clergyman in it without presentation, iastitution, or induction. Hence advowsons are classifled as presentative, collative, and donative. The reason why they wers generally yested in lords of the several juanors was that it was in most cases their aacestors, or at least predccessors more or less reinote, who originally built the chareh, or were "advocates" of ecclesiastical privileges. [ADvocate.] An advowson still attached to a manor is called an appendant. stone.] A stone which falla from the air or aky. The name is somewhat inappropriate now that $I t$ is known that the connection of sime atones with the air to but alight, they gravity thaversing it as, under the operation of gravity, they fall from the regions beyond to of meteorites, from the fact that the fall of one or more aerrolites is generally preceded by ths appearance of a meteoric firc-ball, which, after gleaming forth for a brief period, then explodes, irresistibly suggesting the inference that the aerrolites which fall constituts jta fragmanta. Hence in many acientifle reports aërolites and large meteors are classed under one category. Sometimes aërolite and meteorite are made quite synonymous terma; but it is better to draw a distinction betwean the two, making meteorite the general word and limit ing aërolite to the atony varieties of the genus. This is done by Prof. Maskelyne in his "Guid to the Collection of Minerals in the British Mngenm." The aërolites in this limited sease as a rule, fall to the ground in an incandescent state. They are generslly sub-angular, but with the angular points rounded off, and are coated, to the dapth of about a quarter of a line, with a black erust like varnish. When fractured they commonly display a series of amall grey spherical bodies in a gritty substance occasionally with yellow spota interspersed. When thus consisting of atony spherules they ars sometimes termed chondritic aerolites, from Gr. xordpitns (chondrites) $=$ of the ahape or size of groats; xóvdpor (chondros) $=$ a corn, grain, groat. Iron is found in large quantity lu nearly every aërolite, bometimes malleable, and sometimes io a state of oxide It is always in conncetion with nickel. Other anbstances found in more limited quantity in aerolites are silica, magnesia, sulphur. alumina line, mauganese, chrome, cobalt, carbon, roda and water. No new element has been found but the combination of the old ones ia differ ent from any occurring in this planet

Though the fact that atooes could fall from the aky to the earth was doubted by the scientific almost till the close of the eighteenth century, the occurreace of such a pheaomenon had been again and again popularly reported in various countries, and from a high period of antiquity. There is reason to believe that the object of worship in many a pagan shrine in ancieat times was an aerolite; that this was the case with the idol worshipped in the great temple of Diana at Ephesus is all hut implich in the town-clerk"s words, "The image which fell down from Jupiter ', (Actaxix 35). Among the notabla aërolites in the British Musemn collection may be enumerated a great chondritic one, which fell at Parnallee, in Madras on February 28th, 1857; one which deacemder at Basti, in India, on December 2, 1852, sad is remarkable for containing crystalline calcium sulphide, associated with enstatite and angite and, finally the carbonaceous atones which came down at Cold Bokkeveldt, Kaba, Grosnja, and Montauban. #### Abstract

When little could be done in this department of knowledge except to record facts, airography (a writing about or a deacrlption of the air) was an appropriate enough name; bat now that the canses of many, eerial phenomena are becoming known, aërology (a discourse or reasoning about the air) is the more suitable term.

With the example before him of birds created anatomically on a type in some essential particulars similar to his own, man was certain to covet and seek to attain the art of flying. Two fatal difficulties, bowever, appear for ever to forbid his anccess in this endeavour unless he be assisted by machinery to aupplement his physical defects. Compared with a bird he is proportionately heavier, and that to no slight extent; whllst, in addition to this, tha conformation of his breast does not afford a proper point of attachment for the powerful muscles reqnired to usa his arme after the manner of wings. Any one carving the breast of a fowl can at once perceive the superiority in this respect even of that tspe of bird, to the atrongest man. To affx wings to the arms is useless,

I. Ordinary Language & Lavo:

1. Lit.: The relationship contracted by marriage between a husband and his wife's kindred, or between s wife sad her husband's kiadred. It is opposed to consanguinity, or natural relationship by blood. It is of three kinds: (1) direct, viz, that subsiating between a husband and his wife'a blood relations, and vice versa; (2) scoondary, or that which sub sista between a husband and his wife's rala tions by marriage; and (3) collateral, or thst whit subsista between s husband and the relstions of his wife's relations.

2. Connections (not necessarily by 1.); associstes.
3. Fig.: The resemblance produced, mora or less remotely, by a common origin between languages now in msny respects distiact. Or generally, the similarity between things which essentially resemble each other.

IL Biol. Sing. & phur.: A resemblance, or resemblances, on essential points of structure between species, genera, orders, classea, &c., really akin to esch other, sad which ohould be placed side by side in any nstural eystem of classification. To this Mr. Darwin would add that the resemblances arise from the fact tha the species in which they occur wera derived at a more or less remote dste from a common ancestor. Affinity differs from analogy, the latter term being applied to resemblances between animals or plants not really akin, but which ought to be more or less widely separated in ciassifications. Thus the falcona, the hawks, the eagles, &c., are related to each other by genuine affinity ; but the similarity on certain points, such as the possession of retractile claws, between the raptorial birds and the feline race of mammals, is one only of analogy.

III. Chemistry:

1. Chemical affinity, or chemicsl sttraction, is the force by which union takes place between two or more elements to form a chemical compound. According to another definition, it is s force exerted between two or more bodies at an infinitely minute distance apart, by which they give rise to a new Bubstance having different properties to those of its component parts. Elements have the greatest sffinity for other elements which differ most in their chemical properties. Thus H has grest &ffinity for Cl and O , but the affinity between O and Ci is much wesker.

Acids anite readily with alkaliea, most metal with sulphur. When two salts are mixed together they are decomposed if an insoluble substance can be formed: thus $\mathrm{AgNO}_{3}+\mathrm{NaCl}$ yields NaNO and insoluble AgCl , and BaCl $+\mathrm{MgSO}_{4}$ yields $\mathrm{MgCl}_{2}$ and tosoluble $\mathrm{BaSO}_{4}$. A strong acid generally expels a weaker one, ${ }_{3} \mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{SO}_{4}$ expels HCl or $\mathrm{CO}_{2}$, and $\mathrm{CO}_{2}$ precipiates $\mathrm{SiO}_{2}$. but when two salts are itsed, if a off, as when $\mathrm{NH}_{4} \mathrm{Cl}$ is heated with dry $\mathrm{CaCO}_{3}$, then $\left(\mathrm{NH}_{4}\right)_{2} \mathrm{CO}_{3}$ volatises. $\mathrm{SiO}_{3}$ fused with salte expels the strongest acids and forms silicates. Iron filings hested to redness in a tube decomposes the vapour of water, but $\mathrm{H}_{2}$ passed over red-hot oxide of iron reduces it to a metallic state. These resctions are due to the diffusion of gases, the resulting gas being diffused throagh the mass of vapour passtag through the tube. The relstive affinities beween different subetances varies with their temperature, ineolubility, and power of vaporisation. The nasceat state is fsvourable to chemical combinstion : thus $H$ and $N$ naite resdily when organic matter containing $\mathbf{N}$ is decomposed by hest or putrefaction. also $\mathbf{H}$ with 8 . This is due to the bonds of the stoms being liberated st the moment of decomposition. Disposing afinity is the action of a thin body, Which brings about the union of wo other bodies, as $\mathrm{Ag}+\mathrm{SiO}_{2}$ and aikali forms a silicate of silver; Pt is attacked by fused KHO. Organic decompositions in the presence of csustic alksli, or lime, are also examples. Catalysis is the action of a body to bring sbout a chemical reaction whilst the body itself nudergoes no perceptible change, as $\mathrm{MnO}_{2}$ in the preparation of 0 from $\mathrm{KClO}_{3}$. Certain chemical compounds st high temperatures are diasociated from esch other, as $\mathrm{NH}_{3} \mathrm{Cl}$ at high temperatures forms $\mathrm{NH}_{9}+$ HCL. Chemical union is promoted by finely dividing the substances ; thus finely-divided metals, as iron or lead, take fira in the sir, uaitiag with 0 . Alteration of temperature alters the affinity; thus mercury hested to its boiling-point absorbs oxygen, which it liberates at a higher temperature ; also BaO sbcorbs 0 at a low hest, forming $\mathrm{BaO}_{2}$, sad corba 0 at a 10 w hest, forming $\mathrm{BaO}_{\mathrm{g}}$ sod gives it off at higher temperatures. Strong bases geaerally replace weaker bases; thus alkalies precipitate oxides of iron, sc.
"The gatitity which held together the elements of the organle subiatances is deat roged ty the cause whileh occuioned their death, and they are set iree to obey new afinitieh and form new
2. Affinity of solution is auch an affoity as exiats between a soluble salt and the fluid to which it is dissolved. Till the liquid is satorsted with the salt the two can combine io an indefinite ratio, instead of being limited to the fixed proportions in which alone chemical affinity operates.
IV. Nat. Phil, Current affnity: The force $f$ voltaic electricity.
V. Prychol.: An slleged sttraction existing between persons, generally of the opposite ser; a supposed union or attraction of minds. Also the person exerting such influeace. (A doctrige of spiritualiam.)

C. In composition. Again, in composition, may be a preposition $=$ against, as againsay $=$ to say or speak against. Or it may be, as it generally is, an adverb = again, as againbuy $=$ to buy again, to redeem. If its uumcrous obsolete compounds were arranged according to the precise spelling of again in the individual example given to illustrate them, some would require to figure under again, others under agen, or agane, or agayn. It has leen thought better to bring them together, and to effect this the form agrin has been assumed to exist in all cases, that sctually found being placed after it. The same system will be adopted in similar cases throughout the Distionary.

B．Technically ：

I．Physiol．If the word age he used in the now all but obsolete sense given under A． 1．4，i．e，as one of the stages of human life， then physiology clearly distinguishea six of these ：viz．，the periods of infancy，of child hood，of boyhood or girhood，of adoleseence of manhood or womanhood，and of old age． The period of infancy terminates at two，when the first dentition is conipleted；that of ehlld－ hood at seven or eight，when the second dea－ tition is finished ；that of boyhood or girlhood at the commencentent of puberty，which in Britain is from the fourteenth to the sixteenth year in the male，and from the twelfth to the fourteenth in the female ；that of adolescence forrteenth in the fomale；that of adolescence extends to the twenty－fourth year in the extends to the twenty－forth year in the male and the twentietio in the femala；that of manhood or womanhood stretches on till the advent of old age，which comes bwoner or later，according to the original strength of the constitntion in each individnal case，and the habits which have heen acquired during life． The precise time of human existence ainilarly varies． 2．Law：The time of competerce to do cer－ tain acts．In the male sex，fourteen is the age when partial discretion is supposed to be reached，whilst twenty－one is the period of full age．Under seven no boy can be capitally punished；from seven to fourteen it is doubt－ ul if he cen；at fourteen he may．At twelve a girl can coutract a biuding marriage；st twenty－one she is of full age．In mediaval times，when a girl reached seven，by feudal custom or law，a lord might distrain his tenants for aid［Aio，B．，1］to marry，or rathar teants for aid［AID，3．，1］to marry，or rathar at twelve she could confirn auy consent to marriage which she had Ireviously given ；at marriage which she had Ireviously given；at fourteen sho could take the management of her lands into her own hands；at gixteen she ceased，as is still the law，to be under the control of her guardian；and at twenty－one ghs might alienate lands and tenemants be－ longing to her in her own right．

The Agrarian Laws, in the ancient Roman republic, were laws of which the most imfortant were those earried by C. Licinius Stolo, when tribuos of the people, in B.C. 367. The second rogation, among other enactments, provided (1) that no one should occupy more than 500 jugera (by one calculation about 280, and by snother 333, English acres) of the pablic lands, or have more than 100 large and 500 amali zattle grazing upon them ; (2) that auch portion of the public lands above 500 jugera as was in possession of individuals should be divided amongst all the plebeiana, in lots of 7 juger, as property ; (3) that the occuplers of public land were bound to employ free labourers, in a certain flxed proportion to the extent of their occupation. When at s later period efforts were made to revive tbe Licinian rogations, such opposition was excited that the two Gracehi lost their lives in conaequence, and this, with their other projects, proved sbortive. It is important to note that the land with which the Licinlan or "agrarian" laws dealt was public jaod belonging to the state, and not, as is popularly supposed, private property. The renl opposition to an agrariten law srose from thone wh. by ocupying the gnaveroriated land of the state and omploying their capital and slaves in

1. In a general sense: The art of cultivating the ground, whether by pasturgge, by tillage, or by gardening. In many countries the progress of human economical and social development has been from the savage state to hunting and fishing, from these to the pastoral state, from it sgain to sgriculture propery so called, and thence, finally, to commerce ann manufactures; though even in the hanst an vanced countrips every one of the stages now part the second, still exist and fiourish. The tillage of the soil has existed from a remote period of antiquity, and experience has from time to time improved the processes adopted and the instruments in use; but it is not till a very recent period that the necessity of basing the occupation of the farmer on physical and other science has been even partially recognised. Now a division is made former investigating the scientific princlples on which the cuitivation of the soil should be conducted, and the best unethods of carrying thern out ; and the latter actually doing so in practice.
The soil used for agricultural purposes is mainly derived from aubjacent rocks, which cannot be properly anderstood without aome knowledge of geology, while s study of the dip and etrike of the rocks will also bo of use in determiniog the most suitable directlons for drains and piaces for wells. The composition of the eoll, manures, &c, requires for its determination agricultural chemiatry. The weather cannot be properly understood without meteorology. The plants cultivated, the weeds requiring extirpation, the fungous growthe which ofted do extensive and mysterious damage, fall under the proviace of botany; the domestic animats and the wild mammals, birds, and Insects whlch prey on the produce of the field, under that of zoology. The complex machines and even the simpleat implements are constructed upon principlem revealed by natural philosophy : tarm-build lags cannot be properly planaed or constructed without a knowledge of architecture. Reats can be understood only by the atudent of political cconomy. Finally, farm-labourers cannot be governed or rendered loyal aad trustworthy ualess their superior knows the human heart, and acts on the Christian priociple of doing to those under him as he would wish them, if his or their relative positions were reversed, to do to him. Information on the multifarious subjects bearing on agricul. ture will be found scattered throughout the work; it ia not according to the plan pursued that they should be brought together io oue place.

II. Hence in a limited sense:

1. An intermittent fever, in whatever stage of ita progress or whatever its type. A person about to be seized by it gencrally feels somewhat indisposed for about a fortnight pre viously. Then he is seized with a shivering fit, which ushers in the cold stage of the disease. This passes at length into a hot stage, and it again into one characterised by great perspiration, which carries off the diaorder for a time. The three leading types of agne are the quotidian, with an interval of agne are the quotwan, with au interval of twenty-four hours; the tertion, with one of forty-eight hours ; and the quartan, with one forty-eight hours; and the quartan, with ond of seventy-two hours. The remote or the proximate cause of ague is generally the exposure of the body to the malaria generated in marshes. The remedy is quinine or some other anti-periodic. [ANTI-PERIODIC.]

* Dephlogisticatel air = oxygen gas.
* Fixed air $=$ carbonic acid gas.
* Inflammable air = hydrogen gas.
* Phlogisticated air $=$ nitrogen gas.

2. Now: The gascous substance which fills the atmosphere surrounding our planet. It io elastic, and io destitute of taste, colour, and smell. It containa by weight, oxygen $23 \cdot 10$ parts, and of nitrogen 76.90 : and by volume, of oxygen 20.90 , and of nitrogen 7910 ; or of 10,000 parts there are in perfectly dry air, of nitrogen 7,912, oxygen 2,080, carbonic acid 4, carburetted hydrogen 4, with a trace of ammonia. But air never is dry; it has alwaya in it a varying amount of watery vapour. When exhaled from the lungs it is saturated with moisture, and containg about 4.35 parts of carbonic acid. The prevalence of this latter gas in abnormal quantity is prejudicial to human life, while air with a high per-centage of oxygen in it is healthful and invigorating. Dr. R. Angue Smith, F.R.S., found that the oxygen in the air of various localities varied as followa:-

air-drill, a. A drily driven by compressed air.
aix-drim, s. A large inflatable cyst on the neck of some game-birds.
air-duct, s. The duct leading from the awim-bladuer to the intestinal canal in some tishes.
aix-ongine, caloric engine, s. Any engine which has for its movigg power heated air, that is, which employs air, like steam in a steam-engine, as a medium for transforming lieat into mechanical encrgy. The best known air-engines have been those of the Rev. Dr. Stirling in 1816, Capt Fricsson io 18 i3, and Mr. Philander Shaw in 1867. As yet they have been very partially suceessful. Were they ao they would have this advantage among others over steam-engioes, that air can with safety be raised to a higher tempersture than steant, and therefore can generate a higher anmunt of raechanical eaergy.
air-escape, s. A contrivance for permitting the escape of the air which tends to aceumulate till it obstructs the progress of the water in pipes led over a rising groand. It consists of a hollow vessel, having in its top a ball-cock, so adjusted that when air collects in the pipee it ascends loto the vessel, conects in the pipes it ascends loto the vessel, lescend till it opens tha oock and allowa the air to escaje.
air-fountain, s. A fountain in which the moving power deaigued to raise the water in a jet is air condensed within a veasel.
air-gossamer,s. [AIA-ThREADS] air-gun, s. An instrument designed to propel balls hy the elastic force of condensed air. A strong metal globe is formed, furnished with a sinall hole and a valve opening lowards. Into this hole a condansing syyinge is screwed. When, by means of this apparatus, the condensation has beem brought to the requiaite point of intensity, the globe is detached from the syringe and acreved at tha breech of a gun, so constructed that the ralve breech of a gun, 80 constructed that the ralve may be opened by means of a trigger. A ball may be opened by means of & trigger. A ball is then inserted in the barrel near the breech, so nitting it as to render it air-tight, and the trigger being pulled, the elasticity of the condensed air impels It with conviderabie force.

air-holder, a. An instruinent for holding air for the purpose of counteracting the pressure of a decreasing column of mercury.
air-hole, & An opening to admit the ingress or egress of air.
air-jacket, s. A jacket having air-tight hladders or bags designed to be inflated, with the view of supporting the person wearing it in the water. The air-beit has now anperseded it.
aireline, s. A straight line as if drawo through the air; the shortest distance letweed two points; hance a direct railroad liue.
air-motive engine, s. [A1H-ENGiNE.]
air-pillow, s. A pillow consiating of an air-tight bag inflated with air.
air-pipe, s A pipe connecting the hold of a vessel with the furuace of a slip, and designed to conrey the foul air of the hold to the furnace that it may be burnt. That this purpose may be effected, no air is allowed to reach the furnace for combustion exceptiog that of the hold supplied by the air-pipe.
air-plant, aerial plant, s. A plant which is capable of deriving its outriment for a certaio limited period from the air. The chief genera to which the name has been spplied are Aërides, Vanila, and Sarcanthus, ail Orchids. [Avaioes.]
air-poise, s. [Eng. air; poise.] An instrument for measuring the weight of tha air.
air-pressnre engine, s. An engins in which the moving power is produced by the pressure of air of different densities.
air-pump, s. An instrument invented by Otto von Guericke, of Magdeburg, in 1650 .

THE COMMON AIR-PT SP.
It was designed to exhanst the air from is receiver, but in reality it can do no mora than redace it to a high degree of rarefaction The air-pump now generally in use is a conalderable improvement on that of Gnericke. alderable improvement on that of Gnericke. A betl-formed "receiver" of glase ia made to rest on a horizontal plate of thick glasa ground rest on a horizontal plate of thick glasa ground perfectly smooth. In the centre of that piate, under the receiver, is an opening into a tubo which, passing for some distance horizontally, ultimately branchee at right angles into two portiona, entering two npright cylinders of glasa. The cylinders are firmly cemented to the glass plate, and within them are two pistons fitting them so closely as to be alrtight. Each piston is worked by a rack and pigion, turned by a handla; whilst each cylinder is fitted with a valve, so contrived that when the piaton is rained, conmunicathat when the piaton is rained, connmunica-tion is opened between the cylinder and the receiver, which communication is again closed as the piston falls. It is evident that whea any one commences to work the machine, tha air in the cylinders will be immediately expelled the firat upward motion that they are made to take. The valve will then fly opea, and the air from the receiver will fill both the pistons as well aa itself, though, of coursa, now in a somewhat rarefied state. As the same proceas is again and agaln repeated, the air will becoma increasiogly rarefied, though, as stated above, an actual vacumm never can result from the action now described.
Bianchi's Air-pump is an improvemeat on the cominon one. It is made of iron, and has but one cylinder. It can be made larger than the common machine, and produces a socalled vacuum more quickly. It ia deacribed in Ganot's Physics, Atkinson's trauslation.
Sprengel's Air-pump is a form of air-pump of a totally different kind from the ordinary one. It depends on the principle of converting the space to be exhausted into a Torricelliad vacuam. (Ibid., pp. 144, 145.) [Vaccecm.]
Condensing air-pump, or condensing pump. [Condensing.]
Air-mump gauge: A gange for testing the extent to which the air has beea exhausted in the receiver of an air-pump. It consists of s glass tube beet like a siphon. One leg is closed, as in a barometer, the other open. It is placed under a small bell-jar comnunieating by a atop-cock with the receiver, and the more nearly the mereury stands at the same level, the more nearly lass a vacuum been produced.
Air-pump of a condensing steamengine: The pump which draws the condensed steam, with the air commingled with it and tha condensed water, from the condeoser, and casts them ioto the hot well.

When ased to masure small differances of templeratare; it ia a capillary tube with a bulb st the apper end, and with 3ts lower end planged into a coloored liquid in a bottle. . The air in the bulb at the top ia leated, so as to aause s portion of it to be expelled, leaving the coloured liquld free to rise a certain distance in the tube. An alteration of temperature will then make the remainder of the air in the tube to expand or contract with the effect of making the liqnid eorreapondiagly fall or rise in the tube. Within certain limits it is a delicate thermometer, and was the first form of dicate thermometer, and was the first form of that instruinent as inveated in 1.590, by Santorio, a physician of Padua. It can measure only the lower temperatures. When employed to note highef degrees of heat, a beat capilary tube is substituted for the atraight one. It agrees with the mercarial thermometer up to $260^{\circ}$, but above that point mercury expands relatively more than air. The differential thermometcr of Sir John Leslie is a medification of the air-thermometer. [Differential Thermometea] Kinnersley's Etectric Air-thermometer: An inatrument consisting of a glass tube closed at both eads by air-tight brass caps, through which two wires alide ia the direction of the axis of the tube. These wires are terminated by brass balls, which are made to approach within the atriking distance. To an aperture in the bottom of the lower cap is fitted a bent tube of glass, which turna opwards, and is open at both ends; the bend is filled with mercury, or with a coloured tuid, which may indicate by its riaiog or falling within the indicate by its riaing or railing within the tube any dilatation or contraction that may tube any dilatation or contraction that may take place in the air within the vessel. Every take place in the air within the vessel. Every time a apark passes between the brass balls time a apark passes between the brass bails its old level immediately after the explosion.
air-threads, or air-gossamers, s. The name given to tha long slender filaments often seen is auturn forating in the air. They have been darted out by spidera, especially the Aranea obtextrix, which, momnting to the summit of a bush or tree, darts such threads out till it succeeds in launching one atrong eaongh to support it, and foat it up into the air, which it deairea to asceod in quest of prey.
aif-threatening, $a$. Threatening the air; lofty.
"As from atr-threat'ining tops of cedars tall."
air-tight, $a$. So tight as to prevent the passage of the air. (Uaed of a bottle or tube hermeticaily sealed.)

air-trap, s. A trap or contrivance to prevent the ewcape of foul air from a sewer, or to allow the pure air liberated from water to escape from the knee of a water-maid.

1．Chem．：The name of a class of Albumi－ noida（q．r．）that are soluble in water，as serum
（q．F．）and egg alloumen．Egg albumen differs from serum by giving a precipitate when agitated with ether；it is scarcely soluble in strong nitric acid ；its speecific rotation is 35.50 for yellow light．The whita of eggs is com－ posed of this substance；it dries np into a light yellow gum－liks substance，which will not putrefy．It is converted into coagulated albumen by heating the fluid albumen to $72^{\circ}$ C．It contains sulphur，snd blackens a silver is an antidota in cases of poisoning by corro－ sive sublimste or copper saits．
Coagulated albumen is obtained by hesting neutral solutions of albumen，fibrin，\＆c．，to boiling，or by the sction of alcohol，also by heating precipitated slbuminstes or casein． it is insoluble in water，alcohol，and scarcely in diluta potash，but dissoives in acetic acid by the action of eaustic potash it is con－ verted into albumioate．Pepsin and HCl （hydrochloric acid），st blood－heat，converts it into syntonin，snd then into peptons．
Derived albumins ara insoluble in water， and in solutions of NaCl （sodium chloride）， but soluble in diluta seids sud alkalies．There sre acid albumins snd alkali slbumins．
Acid albumin is formed by sdding s small quantity of dilute HCl （hydrochloric seid）to serum or egg albumen，and gradually raising the temperature to $70^{\circ}$ ；it does not coagulate， and the rotation to the left ia increased to $72^{\circ}$ ． By neutralizing the liquid，s white flocculent precipitate is obtained insoluble in water，but soluble in alkali and in dilute solutions of alkaline carbonates．
Alkali albumin，or albuminate，is obtained by adding very dilute caustic alkali，heating the liquid，snd precipitating with acids．It closely resemblea the casein of milk．Potas sium albuminate is also called protein．

A．Literally：

1．A study of nature with three special objecta：（1）thas of obtaiaing an alkulest． or universal solvent；（2）that of acquir ing the ability to transmnte ali metals into gold or silver，especially the former；（3）that of obtaining ao elixir rito or nuiversal merii eine which might cure alf diseases and inde－ finitely prolong human life．These objects were all desiralie，and it conld not be known $\dot{a}$ priori whether or not they were attainable． To taka the transmutation of metals，the bubstances（some aeventy or nore）at preseut classed as simple elements msy oot always remain in that category；at any moment unt may be found to be a compound of other sulu stances，and require to be taken out of the list． The possitility of this becomes greater whem it is remembered that not merely do allie metals generally nccur in nature together，ln there is also a definite relation between the atomic weights．The means adopter in the pre seientifie age，when alchemy most flourished ［ALCHEMIST］，were more open to ridicule than the oljects aimed at．To achieve succes in the study it was thonght aeedful Ior one to obtain first the＂philoaopher＇s atone，＂de scribed as a red powder with a peeuliar smell A skill d alchemist was called an＂adept．＂In all ages seientific intellects are brought iuto being，and many＂adepts＂were the physical philosophers of the age．Though they fait＋1 in their iminediate objects，they disoovere the sulphnrie，nitric，and unniatic acids，and laid the laid the［oundations of the noble science of modern chemistry．Others were pisendo－ spientists and impostors who pretended that they really bad made gold：by means of men of this latter type alchemy gradually sank in reputatioa，and ultinately became an object of ridjcule to real ecientifie inquirers and to the civilised worid at large．

B. Organic Chem: Alcohol in tha name given to a clasa of compounda differing fron or mocarbons in tha eubstitution on on or more hydrogen atoms by the monatomi into monatomic, diatomic, triatomic, \&c. according as they coatain 1,2 , or 8 atoms of $H$ hydrogen), each replaced by (OH)'. of H hydrogen), each replaced by ( OH$)^{\prime}$. Alcohols may alao ba regarded as water in Which one atom of H is replaced by a hydrocarbon radical. Alcohol can onite with cartain salte, es alcohol of crystallization. The $O$ in $\left.\frac{H}{H}\right\} O$ (water) can be replaced by $S$ (sulphur), as $\left.\begin{array}{l}\mathrm{H} \\ \mathrm{H}\end{array}\right\} \mathrm{S}$ (hydrogen aulphide); so ia alcohol, $\left.\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{5}\right\}$ O, forming mercaptan, $\left.\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{5}\right\} \mathrm{S}$. Alcohol may also be compared with acids, as $\underset{\mathrm{H}}{\mathrm{Cl}}\} O$ (hypochlorous acid), $\left.\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{5}\right\} O$ (alcohol); the H can ba raplaced by K or Na , as Cl$\} \mathrm{O}$ (sodium liypochlorite), and $\left.\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{5}\right\} O$ (sodiam ethylate), therefore it can ba considered as a weak acld. Also it can be compared with bases, as $\underset{\mathbf{H}}{\mathbf{K}}\} \bigcirc$ (potassinm hydrate) with acids forms salts and water. Aa $\mathrm{KHO}+\mathrm{HCl}=\mathrm{KCl}$ (potassium (hioride) and $\mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{O}$ (water), so alcohol and acids form acid ethers and watei: $\left.\frac{\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{5}}{\mathrm{H}}\right\}$, 0 $+\underset{\mathrm{Cl}}{\mathrm{H}}$ (hydrochloric acid) $=\mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{O}$ and $\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{5} \mathrm{Cl}$ (ethyl chloride) An alcohol is said to be prinuary, secondary, or terticury, according as the carbon atom which is iu combination with hydroxyl (OH) is likewise directly comtined with one two, or three carbon atoms The hydrocarbon radicals cau also have their carbon atons linked together in different ways, forming iaomerie alcohols. [Amil Alcohol] Primary alcahols, by the action o oxidizing agents, yield aldehydes, then acids gecondary alcohols, by exidation, yield ketones; tertiary alcoholis, by oxidation, yield a mixture of acids. Aleohols derived from benzol, or its substitution eompounds, are called aromatic alcohols; they contaia one or more benzol rings. [See Bexzene.]
ethyl alcohol (commouly called alcohol), ethylic alcohol, methyl carbinol, spirits of wine, ethyl hydrate, g., $\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{6} \mathrm{O}=\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{5}(\mathrm{OH})^{\prime}=\left\{\mathrm{CH}_{3}\right.$

Chem.: Pure ethyl alcohol, also called absolute alcohol, is ohtained hy distilling the strongest rectified spirit of wine with half its weight of quick-lime. Pure alcohol is a colour less limpid liquid, having a pungent agreeable odour and a burning taste. Its specifie gravity at $0^{\circ}$ is 0.8095 , and at $15^{\circ} 5^{\circ}$ is 0.7938 , its vapour referred to air 1 ह13. It is very infiammable, burning with a jale blue smoke less fiame. It boila at $784^{\circ}$ when anhydrous It becomes viseid at $-100^{\circ}$. It mixes witl water in all proportions, with evolution of heat and contraction of volume; and it readily absorbs moisture from the air, and from substances jmmersed in it. Chlorine converts stances mmersed in it. Chlorine eonverts alcohol into chloral, C . $\mathrm{HCl}_{3} \mathrm{O}$, but in the aleohol into chloral, $\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}^{2} \mathrm{Cl}_{3} \mathrm{O}$, but in the of alkalies into chloroform, $\mathrm{CHCl}_{3}$. bresence of alkalieg into chloroform, ${ }^{\text {By oxidation aleohol is converted into alde. }}$ hyde, $\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{4} \mathrm{O}$, then into acetic acid, $\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{4} \mathrm{O}_{3}$. The aikaline metals replace one atom of $\mathbf{H}$, forming $\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{5} \cdot \mathrm{NaO}$ (rodium ethylate). Strong $\mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{SO}_{4}$ (sulphuric acid) forms with aleohol ( $\mathrm{C}_{1} \mathrm{H}_{5}$ ) H . SO ${ }_{1}$, sulphowinic aid. HCl hydroclilorie aeid) with aleolol yields ethyl chloride, $\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{5} \mathrm{Cl}$, and water. Alcohol can be formed by syntheaia from the elements $\mathrm{C}, \mathrm{H}, \mathrm{O}$ : thus acetylene, $\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{2}$, can be formed by passing an electric eurrent in an atmosphere of II between carbon points; this is converted by between carbon points; this is converted by nascent I into olefiant gas, $\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{I}_{4}$, which is absorbed by $\mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{SO}_{4}$ (sulphurie acid); by dinting with water, and distilling, alcohol is obtained. Aleohol is used as a solvent for alkaloids, resins, essential oils, geveral salts, \&e. Aleohol is obtained by the fermentation of sngars, when a solution of them ia mixed with yeast, Mycoderma cervisio, and kept at a temperature between $25^{\circ}$ and $30^{\circ}$, till

It eaases to give if $\mathrm{CO}_{8}$ (carbonio acid zas) 49.5 per ceat of alcohol, and has is eonlains gravify of 0.9198 at $60^{\circ} \mathrm{F}$. Mad has a specifo of ep. gr. 0.830 ; it is wood spirit in alcohol of ep. gr. 0.830 ; it is duty free, and can be uead instead of apirits of wine for making chloroform, olefiant gas, varnishes, extracting alkaloids, áad for preserving anatomical preparationa, \&c. Wines contain alcohol ; port and sherry, 19 to 25 per cent, claret ead hock and otrong ale, about 10 per cent; brandy, whiakey, gin, sc, sbout 40 to 50 ler cent These liquide owe their latoxicating effects to the alcohol they contain.

Chem. Aldehydes are formed by the oxidation of alcohols, and are re-converted into alcohole by the action of nascent hydrogen; by further oxidation they are converted into acids. They differ from alcohols in having two atoma less of hydrogen, which are removed from the carbon atom containing the radical $\mathrm{HO}^{\prime}$ thedroxyl) connected to it in the alcohol. thus rox $)$ y monat the alde $\lrcorner$ yon The carbon atom baving two bonds nnited atom of hydrogen, the fourth is nited to a monatomic hydrocarhon radical, or hydrogen monatomic hydrocarion radical, or hydrogen. From monatomic alcohols only one aldehyde can be formed; from a diatomic alcohol tbere may be formed a diatomic aldehyde containing tbe radical (OCH)' twles, or an alcohol aldehyde, or acid aldehyde: thus, giycol alcohol could yield

Many aldehydes of monatomic alcohols have been prenared by oxidation of the alcohols, or by distilling a mixture of the potassiom aalt of the corresponding acid with potassinm formate, which yielda potassinm carluonate and the aldehyde. Aldehydes form crystalline compounds with acid sulphites; they also unite with aniline. Ketones are aldehydes in which the atom of hydrogen united to the radical (CO)" is replaced by a hydrocarbon radical.
acetic aldehyde, commonly called aldehyde, acetyl hydride, $s$.

Chemistry: $\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{4} \mathrm{O}=\underset{\underset{\mathrm{H}}{\mathrm{C}} \mathrm{CH}}{\mathrm{CH}_{3}}$ or $\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{3} \mathrm{O} . \mathrm{H}$. Aldehyde is a colourless, limpid, auffocating smelling liquid, boiling at $22^{\circ}$; it is coluble in alcoliol, water, and ether; its 6 p. gr. is 0.8at $0^{\circ}$. It is readily oxidized into acetic acld; when heated with caustic potash it forms a resin called aldehyde resin. Heated with $\mathrm{AgNO}_{3}$ nitrate of ailver), the silver ia denosited as a hright mirror, and the liquid contains silver acetate. Nascent hydrogen converta it Into alcohol. Chlorine converts it into $\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{3} \mathrm{O} . \mathrm{Cl}$ (acetyl chloride). When treated with $\mathrm{H}(\mathrm{CN})$ hydrocyanic acid), it yields alanine, $\mathrm{C}_{8} \mathrm{H}_{7}-\mathrm{NO}_{2}$ (amido-propionic acid). Aldehyde forms a crystallic compound with ammonia, calied aldehyte ammonia, $\mathrm{C}_{2} \mathrm{H}_{4} \mathrm{O} . \mathrm{NH}_{3}$, which torms transparent colourless cryatals; these melt at $76^{\circ}$ and distil at $100^{\circ}$. Aldehyde forms a crystallic compound with $\mathrm{NaHSO}_{3}$ (acid sodium aulphite). It forms polymeric modifications, paraldehyde and metaldehyde. It ia prepared by the action of chlorine and weak alcohol, or by a mixture of $\mathrm{MnO}_{2}$ (binoxide of manganese) and $\mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{SO}_{4}$ (sulphuric acid), or again by distilling a mixture of potaasium cetate and formate. It unites with aniline to form diethidene-dianiline and water.

All Fools' Day, s. The 1at of April ; the day when, according to the ethics handed down probably from pre-Christian times, it ia considered right, if not even la adable, to make fools of all people, if one can, or at least of as many as possible. The approved method of doing this is to send them on silly or bootless erranda. The vietim thus entrapped is called in England an April fool, irr Scotland an April gowk, and in France Poisson d'Avril, an April fish. A similar practice ohtains in India at a somewhat licentious festival called the Huli, or Holee, which ia designed to celebrate the verual equinox.

II. The obligation itself.

1. The tie or ligamen which binds the aub ject to his liege lord the king, in return for the protection which the king allows the subject. It is founded on reason, and therefore affects all natural-born subjects of the king, that is, all born within his "ligeance. For a long time it was formally called universal and perpetual, to distinguish it from the local and temporary obligation contracted by aliens, whilst they remained in a country, to the ruler of that land in return for protection received. Recent legislation has, however, given up this principle, and a British settler in the United States, who has for ever left hi country, ia no longer entitled to claim the protection of our qovereign, or expected to render him or her allegiance in seturn.

Local allegiance is such as is alien, or atranger born, for so long time as alien, or atranger continues within the king's dominion and he continues within the kings dominiou and phetect.)

Natural allegiance is snch as is due from all men born within the king'a dominions immediately apon their birth. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. 1., ch. 10.)

Oath of allegiance: An oath binding one who takes it faithfully to diacharge anch obligation. For 800 years pravious to the Revolition of 1688, this was of a sweeping character, but inmediately after that great event it was modified, and made to run thus: "that he[the person awearing it] will be faithful and bear true allegiance to the king." It will be aeed that no mention is here made of the king' heira, and no effort is msde to define the neture or extent of the "allegiance" to be rendered. Modiffcations of the oath of aliegiance have aince been made by 21 \& 22 Vict c. 49 ; euperseded by $80 \& 31$ vict., c. 75, $\S 6$ and it again by the Promissory Oathe Act 31 \& 32 Vict., c .72 , that now in force.

Spenser'a "Faeris Queene" is a moral allegory. a brief allegory may be considered as a single metaphor; a long one as a series of metaphors. The distinetion between an allegory and a parable is very alight. Crabbe says that a parable ia mostly employed for maral parposes, atid an allegory in describiag historical eventa. The iatter differs from a riddle or enigma in not being intended to perplex. For tha diainction between an allegory and a myth, see the anbjoined example from Max Müller.

I. Geol. and Physical Geog. In these aclences the form of the words is alluvium, or rarely alluvion.

1. Formerly: The gravel, mud, sand, &c., depusited by water aubsequently to the Noachian daluge. It was oppoeed to diluvium, anpposed to be laid down by tha deluge itself, or, in the opinion of others, hy aome great wave or seriea of woves originated by the suddan npheaval of large tracta of land or some other potent cause, different from the comparatively tranquil actlon of water which goes on day by day. [Diluvium.]
2. Now:
(a) "Earth or mud, gravela, stones, and other transported matter which hava been washed away and thrown down by rivera, floods, or other causea upon land not permanently aubmerged beneath tha waters of lakes or seas." (Lyell: Princip. of Geol, Glossary.) Aa generally used, the word is apecially amployed to designats the transported matter laid down by fresh water during the Pleistocene and recent periods. Thus it indicates partly a process of mechanical operation, and partly a date or period. It ahould not be forgotten that the former has gone on through all bygone geological agea, and has not beeu cosfined to any one time. Many of the hardest and most compact rocks were once loosely-colering débriz laid dowa by water. The most typical example of alluvium may be seen in the deltas of the Niie, Gaages, Misaissippi, and many other rivera. some rivers have alluviums of different agea on the alopea down into their valleya. The more modern of these belong to the recent period, as do the organic or other remains which they contain, while the older (as thosa of tha Somme, Thamea, Ouse, &e.), which are of Pleistocene age, enclosa more or leas rudely chipped fint implements, with the remaina of mammats either locally or everywhere extinct. [Neolithic, Palieolithic, Pleistocene, &c] Though in many cases it is possible clearly to separate alluviums of different ages, yet the tendency of each new one is to tear up, re-distribute, and confound all its predecessors.

M Moreover, the last operations of water have a existing alu viums.-Lyell: Elem. of Geal., ch. VLL "As a gereral rule, the finvistlie alluvia of different ages. $\%=-1$ bid., ch. x
(b) Volcanic alluvium: Sand, ashes, &c, which, after being emitted from a volcauo, come under the action of water, and are by it re-deposited, as was the case with the materials which entered and filled the interior of houses at Pompeii. (Lyell: Elements of Geol, ch. xxv., index.)
(c) Marine alluvium: Alluvium produced by inundations of the sea, such as those which have from time to time overflown the castern coast of India. (Lyell: Princip. of Geol, ch. xlvii.)
II. Law. The form of the word generally used in English law is alluvion, and in Scotch law alluvio. In both of these the enactment is, that if an " eyott," or little island, ariae in a river midway between the two banka, it belongs in common to the proprietors on the opposite banka; but if it arise nearer one aide, then it belongs to the jroprietor whose lands, it there adjoina. If a sudden inundation cut off part of a proprietor's land, or transfer the materials to that of another, he shall be recompensed by obtaining what the river has deposited in another place; but if the proceas deposited in another place; but if the process be a gradual one, there is no redress. (Blackbe a gradual one, there is no redress. (Black-

* 1. A kind of instrument. usually made of wood, inscribed with various figures and Runic characters, and repreaenting the orcler of the feasts, the dominical letters, the days of the week, the golden number, and other matters. It was used by the old Scandinavian nations for the computation of time, civil and ecclesiastical. It might be made of leaves connected like those of books, or of brass. or horn, or the skins of eels: or the information might be cut on daggers, or on tools of various kinds. Such productions were sometimes called rimstocks, or primestaffs, or runstocks, or runstaffs, or clogs. Remnants of them are atill found in some English counties.

2. A small book primarily designed to furnish a calendar or table of the days belonging to the geveral months of the year for which it is constructed. It is known that an almanac was published by the Greeka of Alexandria about the second century A.D. Almanaca were prolneed by Solomon Jarchus, about 1150 A.D.; by Purbach, $1450-1461$; and by Regiomontanus, between 1475 and 1506 . In Eugland, King James I. gave the monupoly of almanack-printing to the Universities and the Stationers' Company, but the former were no more than sleeping partners in the concern and ware, therefore, only partially diagrsced by the extent to which astrological predictious ware issued in their works. Not that the company, much leas the universities, believed in these airy vaticinations; they only pandered to the credulity of the public, which would not till 1828 tolerate an almanac with these blote upon it omitted. In 1775 and 1779 mortal blows were struck at the monopoly of the Univeraities and the Stationers' Company, and the pubtication of almanaca is now free to ail. An objectionable atamp duty of Is. 3d. on each copy isaued has also been a wept away. Some modern almanacs, in addition to the calendar, contain an immense mass of astro nomical, hiatorical, poititical, and atatiatical information, all brought up to the lateat date.

" Here comer the almanack of my true date "Ta watch the storms and hear the sily Give all our almanacks the lie."

The Nautical Almanac is nated in the year 1767 , by Dr. Maskely origiastronomer royal, and many years edited by him. It contains a summary of the funar observations made at Groenwich Observatory and by ita aid the mariner observes the moon and adjacent stary with his sextant, and from compariaon of his observations with the positions given in the Nautical Almanac compates his longitnde, and ascertains the place of his veasel on the trackless ocean. This work contains about 600 pages of elaborate astronomical tables, constructed specially for the use of aeamen in any part of the globe bat containing valuable information for the astronomer on land. Each month has twenty pagea, containing foll details of the phenomeaa of the aun and moon; then follow the ephemerides of the aeven principal planets After this comes a catalogue of the feading Exed atars, with their annual variations, fol lowed by a list of the principal stars near which the moon passes in her monthly revolution through the heavens. The eclipses of the year are elaborately described. Then followa a list of atars to be occulted by the moon during each month. The eclipses of Jupiter's aatellites, ao useful in determining the longitade lites, ao useful in determining the longitude at aea, together with the contiguration of the satellitea on those occasiona when the planet satellitea on those occasiona when the planet is viaible, are anccessively detailed; beaidea is viaible, are anccessively detailed; besides other matters equally valnable to the mariner. This alnanac has alwaya been published three or four years in advance, in order that it may be sent to all parta of the world in time for the observation of the phenomena described In its pages.

A. Likerally: An erection made for the offering of sacrifices for memorial purposes, or for some otlier object.

1. In Potriarchial times. An altar designed for sacrifice is mentiooed in Scripture as early as the time of Noall (Gen. viii. 20). Abraham, Isaac, and Jacoh bullt aeveral altars in places where for a brief or more lengthened period they sojourned. Most of these appear to have been for sacrificial purposes, and one or two seem to have been for memorial eads; but the most unequivocal case of the memorial altar was subsequently. (Josh. xxii. 10-34; Gen. xii. 7,8 ; xili. 4 , 18 ; xxii. 9 ; xxvi. 25 ; xxxiii. 20; xxxv. 1, 7.)
2. In Jewish times. At Sinai directions were given that altars should be of earth or of stone unhewn, and that the ascent to them should not be by steps (Exod. xx. 24-26). When the tabernacle worship was established, there was an altar of wood covered with brass, designed for sacrifice, and one overlaid with gold, on which incenae was burnt (Exod, xxvii. 1-8; xxxi. 1-10). Both had projections at the four corners of the upyer surface. To those of the brazen altar victims were bound, and a fugitive from death seizing hold of one of these could not legally be dragged away to meet his could not legally be dragged away to meet his doon. Strictly speaking, all sacrifices were doon. Strictly 8 reaking, all sacrifices were to be confined to the one sacrifieial altar, but to be confined to the one sacrificial altar, but the injunction was observed only to a partial extent. (1 sam. vii. 17; 2 Sam xxiv. 25 ; 1 Kings xvizi. 32.)

3. In Christian times:

(a) In the early Christion centuries altars were generally of wood. During the sixth century stone was employed in the coastruction, and this.continued to the time of the lieformation.
(b) In the Church of Rome an altar is easential, it being believed that in the mass an sctual though unbloody sacrifice is offered for sin. Formerly, also, there was an upper altar (superaltare), which was a small portable one for the consecration of the commanion elements, when the priest had not the opportunity of using the altar in a church or chapel.
(c) In the Church of England. The stone altars which were in the elhurches when the Reformation legan [sce (a)] were removed about the year 1550 , and tables substitutcd for them. Qucen 3lary restored the altars, which were, however, again removed on the accession of Queen Elizalneth. What is sometimes called "the altar" is everywhere in the Prayer Book called " the holy table.
4. Among the old ethnic and modern norChristian nations. Many of the old ethnic nations built altas for idolatrous worship on the topa of hills or in groves. The Greeks and Romans built high altara to the beavenly gods, and some of lower elevation to the demigods and heroea, whilst they worshipped the gods and heroes, whingenes acooped out of the grumat. Many oations have had, and yet possess, altars of turf, stone, wood, or, in rare cases, even of homs; but they sre wholly alusent among the Mohanmedans.
B. More or less figuratively:

1. Used of Christ, by the figure of specch called metonymy, by which the altar is subEltututed for the piacular virtim offered upon it in sacrifice. (Heb. xiii. 10.)
2. The most sacred snot or most bacred survice of religion, truth, or aught elae to which complete conaecration of the powers is the. (Pope: Homer; Iliad v. 592.)
3. The hymencal ultar, or simply the altar: The altar in a church before which a marriage is solemnised. [Hymeneal.]
the In manny countrios it fo noceesary to tarry loug in

To lead to the hymeneal altar: (Lit.): Used, properly, of a bridegroom, who, after the first portion of the marriage service has been performed in the body of the church, goes with his bride to the communion rails, for the his bride to the communion rails, for the conclusion of the eervice as dires

1. Chem.: The name given to donble aalta of aulphate of aluminium with suiphatea of potassium, sodium, ammonium, or of other monatomic metals, as silver, thallium, cæaium, rubidium. They crystallise in octohedra. Potash alnm, $\mathrm{Al}_{2} \mathrm{~K}_{2}\left(\mathrm{SO}_{4}\right)_{4}+24 \mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{O}$, is prepared by the decomposition of a bhate containing iron pyrites, FeS 2 , which is gently taining iron pyrites, $\mathrm{FeS}_{2}$, which is gently burnt and exposed to the air in a moist atate; it oxidiaes and forms anlplatea, and, on tha it oxidiaes and forms anlphatea, and, on the addition of a potash salt to the aolution obtained by water, alum cryatallises out. Alum has a sweet astringent taste, reddens litmus paper, and diasolves in its own weight of boiliag water. Sodium alum is very goluble. Ammonium alum is often prepared by adding the ammonia liqnor of gas-works inatead of potash. Alum is used in dyeing and in preparitg akins, \&c. Alums can be also formed in which ferric or chromic anlphatea replace aluninium aulphate, as potasalo-ferric sulphate, $\mathrm{Fe}_{2} \mathrm{~K}_{2}\left(\mathrm{SO}_{4}\right)_{4}+24 \mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{O}$, and ammonio chromic sulphate, $\mathrm{Cr}_{2}\left(\mathrm{NH}_{4}\right)_{2}\left(\mathrm{SO}_{4}\right)_{4}+24 \mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{O}$ These cryatallise in the same form, and can not bo separated from each other by crystalliastion. Alum is used in medicine as an aatringent in doses of ten to twenty grains. Burnt alum is alum deprived of its water of crystallisation by heat; it is used externally as a slight escharotic.

* alum-earth, or poleura, s. Names formerly given to a fibrous mineral of a silky lustre, brought by Dr. Gillies from the Chilian Andes. It was asid to be used by the inh3bitants as a mordant in dyeing red. Ure describes alum-earth as an impure earthy variety of lignite. Both alum-earth and poleura seem to hava disappeared from the most modern works on mineralogy.

 alumize; from Lat. alumina, pl. of alumen $=$ alum.]
I. Chem.: The only oxide of aluminium known. its sp. gr. ia 39. It is isomorphic with ferric and chromic oxides. it occura native in arystals, as corundum, ruby, sapphire, and less pure as emery, It is the hardest substance known except the diamond. It can be obtained by precipitating a salt of aluminium by ammonia and igniting the precipitate. It is nesrly insoluble in most acids. It is a white, insoluble, tasteless, smorphous powder. Three hydrates are known, $\mathrm{Al}_{2} \mathrm{O}_{3} \mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{O}, \mathrm{Al}_{2} \mathrm{O}_{3} \cdot \mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{O}$, and $\mathrm{Al}_{2} \mathrm{O}_{3} .3 \mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{O}$; the trihydrate is the ordinary gelatinous precipitate. it is soluble in acids and fixed alksliea. It is a weak hase, many of its salts having an acid reaction. It is largely used in dyeing as a mordant. it forms insoluble compounds with vegetable colours called lakes. It oceurs native as Gibbsite. The monohydrate is Diaspore. The dihydrate cannot act as a mordant ; it is soluble in acetic acid. (Sce H"alts's Dict. Chem.) Silicate of aluminium forms the basia of clays.
2. Mineralogy. Aluminium, sometimes called argil, or the argillaceous earth, is the basis of all clays, and imparts to them the plastic character for which they are distinguished. For the aspects which it presents when it occurs native, see No. 1. it enters into the composition of many minerals, the proportion in which it occurs being generally stated juat after that of the silica; this, garnet taken from the Ural Mountains has silica 3686 , and alumina $24 \cdot 19$.

All the ancient ambessadors wera of the former class. In every clvilised nation the person of an ambassador is sacred, hie mansion also is inviolate, and his retinue anbject to no local jurisdiction but his own. An envoy is an inferior klud of ambassador dispatched on a special miesion. A resident, or charge d'afoires, is slso of less dignity than a proper ambassador. Many snch residents exist in India, and represent the Anglo-Indian Governmeat at the courts of the several native rajaha. Consuls are agnin of inferior rank to residents, and are specially charged to protect and promote the commercial enterprise of tbeir counto in the place where they are stationed.

2. Aa geological product. Pliny was correct when he considered it to be an exudation from trees of the Pine family, like gum from the thees of the Pine family, like gum from the cherry, and resin from the ordinary pine. a resinous exudation from nn extinct pine Pinus succinifer, most nearly allied to $P$ abies (Abies excelsa, the Norway Spruce), or $P$. picea (Abies picea, the Silver Fir). IIe lelieved that forests of this tree once grew in the sonth-eastern part of what is now the bed of the Baltic in about $55^{\circ}$ north latitude, and $37-38^{\circ}$ east longitude; but that during the time of the drift they were swept away, and the amber carried south and south-west to Pomerania and the adjacent regions, where now it is found. Subsequently he discovered that amlier had been formed not by the $P$ succinijer only, but by eight other- allied specics, if, indeed, all the Abietine and Cu pressimese of the time and place did not share in ita production. In 1845 he thonght it of the age of the Molasse (Miocene?); in 1854 lee deemed it Pliocene, and perhaps of the drift formation (Upper Pleiocerie $=$ pleistocene) but its exact age is as yet undetermined. O 163 species of plants found in it, thirty stil exist. 800 specica of insects have also heen met with in it, with remains of animals of other classss. [Quort. Journ. Geol Soc., vol ก. Chem.: A substance consisting of $\mathrm{NH}_{3}$ Molecnlar weight, 17. Sl $_{1}$. gr. 8.5 , cumpared with H ; compared with air (i), its sp. gr. is 0.59 . It is a colourless, pugent gas, with a strong alkaline reaction. It can be liqnefied at the pressure of seven atmospheres at volune of $\mathrm{NH}_{3}$, at ordinary temperature about 700 times its yolurne. A fluid dralu of anmonice liguor fortior contains $15 \cdot 83$ grains of $\mathrm{NH}_{3}$, and has a 81 . gr. of 0.89 I . The liquor ammonice of the Pharmacopeia has a sp. gr. of 0959 , and a finid dram contains 5.2 graina of $\mathrm{NII}_{3}$. (Water being unity, the specific gravity of ammonia is -0007594.) Ammoria ia ohtained by the dry distillation of nnimal or vegetable matter containing nitrogen; horus, hoots, \&c, produce large quantities, hence it:s name of syifits of hartshorn. Guano consists chiefly of urate of ammonia But anmonia is now obtained from the liquor af mas-works; conl contajning abont two per cent. of nitrogen. Ammenia jo formed by the action of nascent hydrogen on dilute nitrie acid. Ammonia gas is prepared in the laboratory by heating thgother one part of $\mathbf{N H}_{4} \mathrm{Cl}$ with two parts by weight of quickline, and is collecten neer merenry. $\mathrm{NH}_{3}$ is decomposed into N and $\mathrm{H}_{3}$ by passing jt through a red-hot tube, or ly sending electric spruks through it ; the resulting gases occupy twice the volnme of the anmonia gas. It is used in medicine as an antacid and stimulant; it also increases the secretions. Externatly it is employed as a mbefacient and vesicant. Ammonia liniment consists of one plart of solution of ammonia to three parts of olive oil. Ammonia is used as an antidote in cases of poisoning by prussic acid, tobacco, and other sedative drugs. Substitution ammonias are formed by the replacement of $H$ hy an alcohol radical forming Amines (q.v.), and hy acd radicals forming Amides (q.v.). There are also ammonis suhstitution compounds of cohalt, copper, mercury, and platinnm. (See Watts's Dict. Chem.)

Logic: What logicians bave described as the fallacia amphibolie. It occurs when a sentence, though eonsisting of words each of which, taken singly, is unambiguons in its meaning, is yet itself ansceptible of $n$ doulite signification, on account of the order in which the words are arranged, or for some simitar peason. The Latin language was particularly fact well kord exanples of amp in forth the "prophetic" utterances of the ancient nracles, as in the famous answer returned to Pyrthus when he asked counsel ns to whether he would be successful if he invaded the Romau empire, "A Aio te EAcida, Romanos vincere posse ("I say that you, O son of Eacus, can conquer the Romans ;" or "I say that the Romans can couquer you, $\mathbf{O}$ aon of Farus"). Similarly, the witch "prophecy" in English, "The Duke yet lives that Heny shall depose," may mean "The Duke yet lives who slall depose Ileury," or, "whom Henry shall derose;" but it may be said that the word thut is ambiguons, and that cousequently the sentence is an example not of amphiloly, but of equivocation. A. As substantive. Church History
I. A member of a well-known fanatical sect which largely ligured in the ecclesiastical and civil history of the sixteenth century. It began to attract notice within four years of the ever nemorable 31st of October, 1517 , on which Luther affixed his "theses" to the gate of the castle chureh of Wittenberg. The most eminent of its early lesders were Themas Munzer, Mark Stubner, zad Nicholas Storek. They had heen disciples of lather but becoming disastisfied with the moderate charscter of his reformation, they cast of character of his reformation, they cast his authority, snd attempted more sweeping changes thsn he was prepared to sanction During his sbsence, they, in 1521, began to presch their doctrines st Wittenberg. Laying claim to aupernatural powera, they saw viaions, uttered "prophecies," and made an immense number of proselytes. The lerment which the exciting religions events taking place in Central Europe had produced in men'a minds,

Had made thern impatient of social or political as well as of spiritual despotism；and in 1525 the peasants of Suabia，Thuringia，and Franconia，who had been much oppressed by their feudal buperiors，rose in arrns，and com－ naenced в sanguinary otruggle，partly，no doubt， for religions reformation，but chiefly for poli－ tical entancipation．The Ausbaptists cast in tical emrancipation．The Ausbaptists cast in their lot with the inburgent peasantry，and became their leaders in battle．After a time the allied princes of the Empire，led by Phllip， the allied princes of the Empire，led by Philip， and biunzer was defeated，captured，put to the torture，and uitimately beheaded．In 1532 some extreme Anabaptists from Holland，led by a baker called Juhn Matthias，and a tailor， John Boccoldt，called also，from the place whence he came，John of Leyden，seized ou whence he came，Mor，in Westrhalis，with th the eity of Munster，in westinatua，kingelonn， view of setting un in it a spintual kinguon， jeign．The name of Minster was changed to that of Mount Zion，and Matthias becane its aetnal king．Having soon after lost his life in a mad warlike exploit，the sovereignty de volved on Boccoldt，who，among other fanati cal freaks，once pronmenaded the streets of his capital in a state of absolute pudity．．On the 24th of June，1535，the Bishop of Minnater te took the city by force of arms，and Boccoldt was put to death in the most eruel mamer that could be devised．The excesses of the that conld be devised．The excess of by the Anabaptists were eagery harty to diseredit the Reformation． Pepish jarty to diseredit the Reformation
If was in the year li534，when Bocoldt was It was in the year 1534 ，when Boccoldt was in the height of his glory in Mrinster，that in the height of his glory in Minster，that lomatius Loyola took the first step towards founding the order of the Jesuits，and the extension and rapid success of that celebrated fraternity are to be attrihuted in a very large measure to the renction against Protestantism groduced by the share which the Anabaptists took in the peasants＇war，and the character of the spiritual sovereignty which they set up white Minster was in their hands．
$\dagger 2$ ．One belonging to the modern Bantist church．The term is used only by those who pelieve in infant baptisn，and is properly leconing obsolete，there being an unfairness in using an expression which suggests a con nection between the turbulert fanatics of Miinster and the quiet law－abiding English Baptists．［Astabaftism．］

+1. The letters of any word read backwarda. Thus in a atire on the Whig government under Lord Melbourne, which appeared in a provincial Tory paper, the political leader was described as Enruoblem, which was aimply Melbourne apelled backwards.
2. The letters of any word or words transpoaed in their order 80 as to make another word, or more generally a short gentence. Thus the lettera in the name of William Noy Attorney-General to Charles I., who toiled hard in his vocation, become, when transposed, I moyl in law. Similarly Gaten becomes by transposition angel, and Mary, army. The practice was not much in vogue among the Greeks and Romans, but it was cont mon among the Jewish cabalists. Among European nations it first began to be extensively employed in the sixteenth century Sometimes writers put not their own name but its anagram on their works; tlius, Calvin put not Calvinus, but its anagram Alcuinus, on the edition of his Institutes published at Strasburg in 1539. In certain cases mathematicians who had made dis coveries for which they wished to claim priority without communicating their secret, gave forth its anagram instead of itself. This was done by Galileo, Huyghena, and Sir Isaac Newton. Sometimes these anagrans werc intentionally so obsenrely worded, and of such a length, as to render their solution almost impossible. Thus Galileo announced his observations on Saturn:-Smaismrmilme poeta leumi bone nugttaviras $=$ aldissimum planetam tergeminum observavi (I have obplaneusm that the most distant planet is tripleformed). Huyghens also announced his dis covery of Saturn's ring in the following ana gram :-aааааая cocec d eceee iiiiiii 1111 mm annnnannn 0000 pp a rr s itttt unumu $=$ annuto cingitur, tenul poto (it is surrounded by a slender ring, nowhere coherent, inclined to the ecliptic).

B. Technically:
I. Math: The term analysis, signifying an unloosing, as contradistinguished from synthesis = a putting together, was first employed by the old Greek geometricians to characterise one of the two processcs of investigation which they pursmed. The Analytical Method of inquiry has been defined as the art or method of finding ont the truth of a proposition by first supposing the thing done, and then reasoning back step by step till one arrives at some admitted truth. It is called also the Method of Invention or Resolution. A nalysi. in Mathematics may he exercised on Analysi. in mathematics may be exercised oo Thite or on infinite nagnitudes or numbers. T3a analysis of finite quantities is the same as incoious arithmetic or algebra. That of iofimites, called also the new analysis, is particularly used in fuxions or the differential calculus. But analysis could be employed also in geometry, thongh Euclid preferred to make his immortal work synthetic; it is therefore a departure from correct language to use the word analysis, as mauy on the Continent do, as the antithesis of geometry; it is opposed, as already mentioned, to synthesis, and to that alone.

"Trbe following method may be adopted for thls kind of quantictive analysis."-Todid & Borman.

Chemical analysis is classified into Blowpipe, Qualitative, (Iravimetrical, and Volumetric analysis; and the Proximate and the Ultimate analysis of organic bodies.

1. Llowpipe Anatysis: The substances examined by the blowpipe are (1) heated alone on charcoal; (2) heated on a platinum wire With borax (q. v.) ; (3) with microcosmic salt, $\mathrm{NaH} .\left(\mathrm{NH}_{4}\right) \mathrm{PO}_{4}+4 \mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{O}$; (4) with sodium carbonate; (5) on a piece of charcoal which has been moistened with a few drops of nitrate of cobalt; (6) fascd with jrotassium nitrate. The rezetions are given under the respective metals (q.v.). (Consult Plattner on the Blowpipe.)
2. Qualidrsive Arullysis is employed to tind ont the crmposition and properties of any unknown yoibstance, and to separate different Suhatances from each other. It is performel in the following manner:-The substance is dissolved in distilled water; if not aoluble in water, then in hydrochloric acid or in aquawater, then in hydrochloric acid or in aqua-regia; if insoluble in these, it is fused with regia; if insoluble in these, it is fused with sodium carbonate. The commoner bases and acils contained in the solution are tested for as follows :-
Add hydrochloric acid. A white precipitate is either AgCl (argentic chloride), $\mathrm{Hg}_{2} \mathrm{Cl}_{2}$ (nercurous chloride), or $\mathrm{PbCl}_{2}$ (plumhic chloride). Filter; pass $\mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{~s}$ (sulphuretted hydrozen gaa) through the filtrate. A bluck precipitute is either PbS (plumbic auphide), CaS (cupric sulphide), HgS (mercuric sulphide), or $\mathrm{Bi}_{2} \mathrm{z}_{3}$ (sulphide of bismuth). A yellow precipitate is either CdS (cadminm sulphide), $\mathrm{As}_{2} \mathrm{~S}_{3}$ ar $\mathrm{As}_{2} \mathrm{~S}_{5}$ (sulphides of arsenic), or SnS ${ }^{\text {(stannic }}$ sulphide) A brown precipitate is Sns (stannous sulphide). An orange precipitate is Sbas $_{3} s_{3}$ (antimonic sulphide).
Filter; boil tha flltrate to expel $\mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{~S}$, add a few drops of nitrie acid, and boil to oxidise the and then add chloride of ammonium and ammunia A red precipituse is $\mathrm{Fe}_{2} \mathrm{O}_{3}$ (ferric oxids) . ${ }^{4}$ ' bbsish-groen 'prectpitate is $\mathrm{Cr}_{2} \mathrm{O}_{3}$ (aluminic oxide), or phosphates, borates, and oxalates.

Filter; to the filtrate add sulphide of ammonium, A black precipitate is either Cos (sulphide of cobalt), or NiS (sulphide of nickel). A pink precipitate turning brown is MnS (sulphide of manganess). A white precipitate is ZnS (sulphids of zino).
Filter; to the filtrate sdd ammonium carbonate. A white precipitate is either $\mathrm{BaCO}_{3}$, $\mathrm{SrCO}_{3}$ or $\mathrm{CaCO}_{3}$ (earbonates of barium, stronthum, or calcium)

Filter ; divide the fiftrate into two parts. To one part sdd $\mathrm{Na}_{2} \mathrm{H} . \mathrm{PO}_{4}$ (sodium phosphate). A white precipitate is $\mathrm{Mg}\left(\mathrm{NH}_{4}\right) \mathrm{PO}_{4}+6 \mathrm{H}_{2} \mathrm{O}$, other part is evaporated to dryness, heated other part is evaporated to dryness, heated atrongly to drive off the ammoniacal calts, atrongly to drive off the ammoniacal calts, and soda.
Ammoniacal salts are tested for in the originat solntion by adding caustic potash, which liberates ammonia, $\mathrm{NH}_{3}$, which is recognised by ita smell, and by its turning red litmus paper blue.
The salphides of arsenic, antimony, and tin are soluble in sulphids of ammoninm, and are re-precipitated by $\mathbf{H C l}$.
Ths tests for the other rarer metals and acids, and the confirmatory tests for the above, are given under their respsctive namea (q. . .).

Acide may be tested for as follows:-Carbonic, hydrosulphuric, hydrocyanic acids ars liberated by stronger acids with effervescence. Carbonic, arsenious, arsenic, chromic, boracic, phosphoric, oxalic, hydroftuoric, and silicic acids give from a neutral solution a white precipitate, with $\mathrm{BaCl}_{2}$ (barium chtoride), whith dissolves in hydrochloric acid; but sulphoric scid gives a white precipitate imsulpharic in acids.
Tartaric and citric acids are recognised by the precipitate charring when heated, and emitting fumes of peculiar odour Chloride of ealcium, with phosphoric and boracic acida, gives a wehite precipitate, which is soluble in acetic acid; also with oxalic and hydrofluoric acids, a white precipitate, insoluble in acetic acid.
Nitrate of silver $\left(\mathrm{AgNO}_{3}\right)$ gives a black precipitate with hydrosulphuric acid, a yellow precipitate with arsenious, phosphoric, and silicicacid; a red precipliate with chromic and silsenic acid; and a vehite precipitate with arsenic acid; and a achite frecipitate with boracic and oxalic acids. All tates are soluble in nitric acict.
Nitrate of silver ( $\mathrm{AgNO} \mathrm{S}_{3}$ ) gives a precipitate insoluble in nitric acid with hydrochloric, hydrocyanic, hydrobromic, and hydriodic acids.
Ferric chloride ( $\mathrm{Fe}_{2} \mathrm{Cl}_{6}$ ) gives a red colour with acetic acid and sulphocyanic acid ; s blach precipitate with gallic and tannic acids; a blue precipitate with ferrocyanides, Nitric acid ( $\mathrm{HNO}_{8}$ ) and chloric acid $\left(\mathrm{HClO}_{3}\right)$ are not precipitated by any reagent. Their qalts deflatrate on ignited charcoal
For conirmatory tests for acids, see under their respective names. (See Fresenjus', Galloway's, or Will's Qualitative Analysis.)
3. Gravimetrical Analysis, or quantitative analysis by weight, is the method of separating out of a weighed quantity of a compound its conatituents, either in a pure stats or in the forn of some new substance of known composition, and accurately weighing the products; from the resulta of these operations the percentage of the constituents contained in the cubstance can be determined. (For mothods see Fresenius' Quantilative Analysis.)
4. Volumetrical Analysis, or quantitative analysis by measure, flctermines the amount of the constituents contained in a given solution by-
(a) Neutralisation of a measured quantity of the liquid by a certsin volnme of a standard solution of acid or alkali.
(b) By the quantity of a standard solution of an oxidising or reducing agent required to oxidise or reduce a measured quantity of the liquid to be tested.
(c) By observing when no further precipitation takes place on sdding the standard solution of the reagent to a known voltuare of the liquid to be tested. (See Sutton's Volumetric Analysis snd Mohr's Titrirmethode.)

IT The chief names in antiquity which have come down to our time as anatomiats are those of the second Hippocrates，who was born B．C．460，and died about 377 ；Ariatotle， who made his chief anatomical investigations between B．C． 334 and 327 ；Herophilus and Erasistratua of Alexandria，in the third cen－ tury B．C．（？）；Celsus，A．D． 3 to 5 （？）；and the most illustrious，in thia respect，of all，Galen of Pergamus，who was born in A．D．131，and died about the beginning of the third century． In modern times the revival of anatomical atudy began in Italy，and quite a crowd of illustrious inquirers flourished in that country before much was done in this department of seience in the other parts of Burope．The first was Mondini of Bologna，who flouriahed about A．D．1315．Of the rest may be men tioned Eustachi，about 1495 or 1500 ，after whom a tube in the ear ia called，and valvular membrane in the heart［EUSTA Chian］；Fallopio，or Fallopiua，who was bort gave a name to the Fallopian tubes of the uterus；Cæaalpini，after whom the Cæsalpinia genus of planta is called ；and finally，Malpighi， born in 1628，and died 1694，after whom the Malpighia genue of plants and a gland are named．Of the early English anatomiste，the most illustrious was Harvey，who was born in 1578，published his immortal work，in which the circulation of the blood is intimated，in 1628，and died in 1657 ．The later anatomista who have rendered good service to the acience are too numerous to be mentioned here．

I．Animal Anatomy．To this the name of Zootomy is sometimes applied．It is naturalify oubdivided into（a）Human and（b）Compara． tive Anatomy．
（a）Human Anatomy，or the anatomy of the human subject．It is sometimes called An－ thropotomy（q．v．）．The prejudice against allowing the body of a relative，or even a corpse of any kind，to be dissected，long re－ tarded the progress of this lighlily important and useful department of human knowledge， the ancients，and many moderns too，being obliged to limit their dissections to the dead bodies of the lower animals，drawing analogies thence to the human frame instead of directly atudying the corpses of mankind．Happily this difficulty has now been in large measure overcome in all civilised conntries．Human anatomy is generally divided into three sub－ divisions，Descriptive，General，and Pathologi－ cal or Morbid Anatomy．The first investigatea the various organs of the human body as they are in health，and the third as they are in disease；whilst the aecond inquires into the diseage；whilst the aecond inquires into thie are common to several organs．Somctimes Descriptive Anatomy，as distinguished from that which is General，is called Particular or Special．Sometimes，again，a new category is added，Surgical Anatomy，which treats of the position of the several organs with the view to possible surgical operations．
（b）Comparative Anatomy：The science which compares the atructure of mans with that of the inferior animals，and alao that of the several classea，orders，\＆c．，of the animal kingdom among each other，to ascertain the resemblances and dissimilarities in their analo－ gous structures and organs．The knowledge thus acquired is then used for purposes of classification and for the study of develop－ ment．This is the science of Cuvier，Owen， and Muxley．

I. Mech. & Nout. : A weil-known instrument for preventing a ship from drifting, by mooriog her to tha bottom of the sea, provided that the water is sballow enough to permit of this being done. Its invention was at a very early period Those of the early Greeks were simply large stones, sacks flled with gand, or logs of wood loaded with lead. Then this Tuscans, or Midas king of Phrygia, introduced a tooth, or fluke, which was ultimately exchanged for two. The modern euchor consists of a long bar or shank of iren (c), branching out at the lower extrenity into two arms (b) endiag in flukes (a), barbed at their extremity, ond with a stock of oak or wood (r) at the upper one, while it terminates in a ring, to which a rope or chain is affixed. The arms or flakes are designed to penetrate and fix thembelves io the designed to penetrate and fix thembelves io the sea-hottom. They cousist of a llade, a paim, sea-bottom. They cousist of a made, a pam, and a bill. The one end of the shank is made and a bill. The one end of the shank is made squere to receive and look the stock steadily square to receive and lold the stock steadily in its place without turaing. To keep the stock algo from shifting along the shank, there are raised on it from the solid lron, or welded ou it, two square tenon-like projections, callcd nuts. The end of the shank next the stock is called the small round. The other extremity, where the arms and the shank unite, is called the crown; and the points of the angle between the arms and the ehank, the throat. $A$ distance equal to that between the thruat of one arm and fts bill [Bich] is marked on the shank from the place where it joins the arms, and is called the trend. The use of the shank is to present an attachment for the cable. [Casle, Shackla, Ganeen.] That of the stock is to make the aochor fall in such a way as to enable one of the flukes easily to infix itself in the ground. Large vessels heve more anchore than one, which are atowed in different parts of the ship. The best bower to the atarboard, the small bower [BowER] to the port-cathead, with the finkes on the bill-board, the sheet anchor on the after part of the fore-channels on the atar board sitde, and the spare anchor on the port side. [For other adobors, see Streas, Kedar, Grapnel, Mushroom, Floatina Moonina.]

2. Naut. Some technical phrases which have found their way into English literature have already been givea. [A. 1.] Others are the following :-

An anchor is said to come home when it ls wrenched out of the ground and dragged forward by the violence of tlie wind or the sea, or by the strength of a current. It is foul If it become entangled with the cable; $a$-wash when the stock is hove up to the surface of the water; a-peak, when the cable is so drawn as to bring the slip directly over it ; a-cockbil [A-cockbile], when hanging vertically; a-tin, when drewn out of the gronnd in a perpea dicular direction; and ct-weigh, when it has been drawn just out of the ground and hangs vertically.

At anchor is the same as anchored.

* The words ancient and old are akin in meaning, and it is not easy to draw an absolutely precise line between their respective signiftcations. Old, being opposed to new, is especially used of anything which is fresh when new, but has a tendency to wear out when old, or has nearly resched its proper term of existence, as an old hat; but it is also used when the lapae of time has increased instead of diminished the value of an article, as old wine. So also we speak of the old masters, meaning those who lived long ago, not those who are advanecd in years. Finally, old generally indicates a lesser amount of duration than arcient.
